On the Willamette Scene - Campus Briefs

A look at campus religious life

The two feature articles on pages 4 and 5 of this issue of WILLAMETTE SCENE provide insight into the campus religious life at a time when, as one student put it, there appears to be a new questioning of "What do I believe?"

Commentary from students and six members of the "over 30" sector of the campus community touches upon some of the currents in the apparent spiritual reawakening that is becoming increasingly more evident in this country.

Should the commentary prompt pro or con reactions from our readers, we would appreciate hearing from them. RCW.

A coming in and going out

At a time when tuition and fees are at a record high of nearly $2,000 annually, financial aid to Willamette students reached an all-time high this year also.

A total of 902 students—665 undergraduates and 237 in law—received $1,334,818 in grants, scholarships, loans and/or campus employment. About 53% of the student body are receiving some form of assistance, with the average about $1,480 per student.

The disbursements include $482,995 in grants and scholarships; $728,900 in loans; and $118,640 in wages for on-campus employment. The old record was $1,266,000 in 1970-71.

Oregon study proposed

Several new wrinkles in the Willamette curriculum have been met with enthusiasm by the students (see article on page 3). Another proposal on the drawing board for possible faculty approval this spring should generate some interest.

Professors Don Breakey, biology, and Harry Rorman, earth science, are hoping to provide a four-week, post-session environmental field studies course for about 25-40 students, May 15-June 1.

The idea is to spend a week on campus, prepare for a session to look to scrutinize three-week from seashore to Oregon.

sandy desert. Simply put, it will be a sophisticated "show and tell" on the environment, ecology, and geological aspects of a state with a wealth of natural exhibits. The plan, if approved, calls for present Willamette students to have first crack at enrollment for the course, with non-WU students filling any vacancies. A tuition fee of $250 is proposed for the one credit course.

From the multitudes, a few chosen

Last year was considered a vintage year in the College of Law. From 1,105 applications, 148 students were selected for the first year class. Some 459 of the 1,105 had applied by Jan. 24, 1971.

It's anyone's guess at how many will apply this year, but by Jan. 24 some 943 applications—or double last year—had been received. Acting Dean Larry Harvey expects the quality of students as represented by Law School Aptitude Test Scores and college GPA to exceed last year's all-time high. The first year class will again be limited to under 150 students in a student body of about 375.

Undergrad applications up too

Applications are up for undergraduate admission as well, with Dean of Admissions Buzz Yocom reporting a 24% increase over last year by Feb. 1.

Willamette is in the first year of a two-year trial period of not requiring Scholastic Aptitude Test scores from the College Entrance Examination Board. High school grades and letters of recommendation will be the major items in admissions decisions. Dean Yocom reports that last year's freshman class had the highest academic record in the University's history, with 70 percent of the new students having a GPA of 3.0 (B average) or better.

Forensic success evident

The trophy case in the rhetoric department has some shiny new additions, reflecting the success of Willamette's forensics team this year in six tournaments in Oregon, Washington and California.

Coached by Paula Casey '69, a third year law student and part-time instructor, the team has earned six trophies. The combined debate record is 45-32. Four more tournaments are on the spring schedule.

Doug Holden

Holden heads hoopsters

The hardware hasn't been awarded yet, but senior basketball guard Doug Holden can begin dusting off a spot in his personal trophy case for this year's MVP award.

Holder of the single season scoring record with 603 points last year, the unanimous all-Northwest Conference pick from 1970-71 is having an even better campaign this year in leading the Bearcats down to the wire toward the NWC championship.

On Jan. 26, the six-foot tall Portlander became the number one all-time career scoring leader, snapping Bob Lundahl's four-year mark of 1,583 points. At his present rate of 22 points per game, he should exceed 1,800 points in a sparkling four-year career.

On Jan. 29, against Pacific, Holden hooped 40 points to claim the single game scoring record, erasing the 38 points by Ed Grossbacher in 1960 and Lundahl in 1969.

Coach Jim Boutin, experiencing his best season in five at the Bearcat helm with over 20 wins, calls Holden "the best player I've coached and I'd be surprised if Willamette's ever had a better player." More than just an outstanding scorer, Holden excels on defense with his quickness and hustle. An excellent passer, he also leads the Bearcats in assists and recoveries.

Willamette claimed a share of the NWC basketball championship, defeating Lewis and Clark in the last game of the season 75-68 to share the crown with the Pioneers, both with 11-3 records.

The Bearcats, with two wins over the Pioneers and a 21-5 season record, were seeded number one in the four-team NAIA District 2 Playoffs scheduled March 4 and 6.

The championship is the first for Willamette since 1960 and the first for LC since 1964 when Willamette coach Jim Boutin was a Little All-American for the Pioneers.

Comida y conversacion

In an effort to increase the contact between Willamette students and students from foreign countries, Spanish professor Raul Casillas is leading the way. He is inviting Spanish speaking students from among the 900 foreign students at the University of Oregon to join the 25-35 Willamette students who meet every Thursday for lunch at the "Spanish table."

Schorr to address graduates

Noted newsman Daniel Schorr, chief of the CBS news bureau in Central Europe, will be Willamette's commencement speaker May 14. A former free-lance correspondent for the New York Times, Christian Science Monitor, and London Daily Mail, Schorr has been associated with CBS news since 1953. He has had special assignments in Latin America; he reopened the CBS bureau in Moscow in 1955; and he has been the Central Europe news chief since 1960. Schorr was selected after a poll of the class of 1972 revealed a desire by the students to hear a newsman-commentator.

Succeeds Ogdahl

Schaffeld Gets Head Grid Job

A good football coach knows when hard work starts to erode morale. Players admire and respect that ability, and that is basically why Willamette's football players were thrilled when Joe Schaffeld was named their head football coach.

When 20-year veteran Ted Ogdahl retired from coaching in December, the Bearcat gridders made their wishes known. Star running back Dan Mahle circulated a letter among the returnees and got all 45 signatures in support of Schaffeld for the vacancy.

When a screening committee of representatives from the faculty, student body, alumni and administration had narrowed their choices from among 30 applicants to one, Joe was their choice. President Roger Fritz received the recommendation and announced the appointment Feb. 7, noting that "Joe has done an outstanding job as our assistant football coach. I have been very favorably impressed by the high regard in which he is held by the members of the football team and by his personal ambition to develop an outstanding program at Willamette."

The 36-year-old Schaffeld becomes the 21st Willamette grid coach, succeeding a man who compiled the longest tenure at the post and the most victories. Ogdahl submitted his resignation in order to pursue his doctoral studies at Oregon State full time in anticipation of a career change. He retired with a 98-64-10 record and seven championships or co-championships in the 20 years.

Schaffeld, a former University of Oregon standout and head coach at Central Catholic High School in Portland, became noted as a defensive specialist in his six years at Willamette. His defensive platoon topped Northwest Conference statistics four of the six years, including this past campaign when Willamette tied for the championship.

A solidly built, physically tough person, Schaffeld often surprises new acquaintances with a gentle and amiable personality. He was labeled the "Rimrock Savage" by long-time Oregon trainer

Bob Officer who called Joe "one of the toughest players I ever taped." Schaffeld's gridders and wrestlers (he is the head wrestling coach) are aware of his toughness, but it doesn't get in the way of his ability to coach and encourage better performances.

Mahle summed up the players' feelings for Schaffeld by saying "He's interested in us as individuals and he cares about the little things."

That might be exemplified in his approach to recruiting. "We're not out to exploit the players. If they don't want to come to Willamette for a good education, to attend classes and to graduate, then we don't want them," said Schaffeld, who believes that participation in football helps a young man prepare for the game of life.

"They won't be football players all their lives, so it's important to have them gain some of the experiences that carry over into daily living like responsibility, physical conditioning, teamwork, sacrifice, perseverance and the satisfaction of knowing they've given their best effort," he said.

All-NWC linebacker Byron Brooks, a potential Little All-American, has great respect for Schaffeld as a teacher and a man. "He really knows a lot about the game, he knows where that fine line is between keeping morale up and overworking the players, and probably the key for most of us is that he makes the game enjoyable," Brooks said.

Schaffeld will have a good nucleus of returnees back this fall, and he's busy recruiting to fill some of the holes in the offensive line. He said he puts desire, quickness and speed ahead of size when looking for players. He stresses fundamentals strongly, "but if a player gets the job done without the classic style, that's all right." He does stress conditioning, and he'll expect his '72 Bearcats to refrain from any indulgences that erode physical shape.

"I'm excited to have this opportunity at Willamette because I enjoy working with the young men that Willamette attracts," he said.

THE UGLY CITY DOESN'T MAKE IT. WHY?

Answers to that question will be sought by 18 students enrolled in a new course at Willamette called "Introduction to Urban Form and Design." Most of them are political science majors participating in the University's new Program in Urban and Regional Government (PURG)

Without the aid of prior courses in art or architecture, the 18 students in Urban Form and Design will explore the hows and whys of turning urban ugliness into beauty.

Art professor Roger McAlister, who conceived the course in collaboration with political science professors Sue Leeson and Ed Stillings, readily admits "it's experimental."

"It may be presumptuous to expect students to learn enough in one semester to enable them to judge for themselves the relative merits and failings of specific architectural, urban and environmental plans or projects," he said.

He'll find out soon enough.

He warned those who enrolled that the course "will require the application of your intelligence and knowledge gained from other studies. You will have design problems that will require intelligent thought, time, common sense, and probably more intuition than you have been asked to use so far."

If that wasn't enough of a warning, he added, "It will also require a willingness to stick your neck out and perform over your head, repeatedly!"

Why the apparent rigorous approach?

"Many of these students may be working in offices directly connected to the planning, designing, building and rebuilding of urban areas. Their major field background is essentially that of being on the administrative side. We can't overstate the importance of urban planning from a visual point of view involving urban architecture in its broadest aspects," explains McAlister.

That brings up the question of the ugly city.

"Oversimply put, the acid test of any urban structure is to get affirmative answers to these questions: Does it tend to bring people back to the city? Would I live there? Eat there? Shop there? Work there?" stated McAlister.

"Good architecture can put good planning into good form," he said, "but lousy architecture can put good planning into lousy form and poor planning cannot be corrected by good architecture. It can only help in the sense of putting a good body on a sick soul," he reasons.

A Working Familiarity

He told his students that they would acquire a working familiarity with the problem-solving and designing procedures used by architects and allied designers, as well as some minimal skills in the design process itself.

"The approach and process of functional design that we will use is basic to the design of a house, a complex of city structures, or an entire city," he said. "How does a physical structure meet emotional as well as physical human needs? Your problem solutions will hopefully answer that question," he added.

To get their design minds in gear, the first simple assignment was to select a site and design an outdoor "classroom" on campus, which called for attention to the aesthetics as well as the purely physical requirements.

After a couple of more simply hypothetical design problems, the class will delve into real problems.

Similar to the other PURG courses which are gaining realism through extensive involvement with the problems, projects and personalities of Salem's governmental agencies, the Urban Form and Design course will utilize off-campus resources.

In addition to having guest architects and city planners, McAlister hopes to borrow copies of plans, planning criteria, and other graphics or documents that will be relevant to their study.

A Study of Salem

With such ongoing projects to study as the Central Salem Development Program; the Salem Area Comprehensive Plan; the North Salem, Hollywood and Richmond/Ferry Oaks Projects; the Pringle Creek and River Park Projects; any downtown parking structures; and any "Turnkey" Planned Unit Development plans, McAlister expects to make some meaningful assignments.

Many of his students will be interning in offices and agencies through other PURG courses, perhaps giving them a chance to exercise some of their judgment that is developed in Urban Form and Design.

The interns have already completed prerequisite courses to assure greater professionalism in their approach to specific intern assignments.

Since McAlister's class is just in its first month and PURG only in its second semester, it is too early to assess the concept's full impact.

"We've had enough positive feedback from students and our off-campus resource people to give us encouragement," said the young Dr. Leeson, "but a full evaluation would be premature."

PURG's Goals

She explained that PURG has essentially four major goals:

—To provide a bridge between liberal arts and intelligent citizenship;

—To relate theoretical investigation and academic understanding to observation of and participation in actual political and governmental processes;

"Urban planning requires a lot of ingenuity, a touch of utopianism, a healthy respect for economic feasibility, a bundle of technical expertise, considerable citizen involvement, concern for the public interest, appreciation of individual rights, and even some old-fashioned political cunning."

—To encounter the dynamic relationships of cooperation and tension among various governmental organizations as they confront urban and regional problems in the effort to make urban America a decent environment in which to live; and —To provide students with a practical background for future study or careers in government service.

Integrated Disciplines

The program integrates several disciplines into a comprehensive understanding of the complex urban environment, encompassing political science, economics, sociology, art and religion.

Courses are designed to complement one another, equipping students with both a theoretical framework for making sense of urban life and practical involvement with several working elements of an urban complex, said Dr. Leeson.

"Urban planning requires a lot of ingenuity, a touch of utopianism, a healthy respect for economic feasibility, a bundle of technical expertise, considerable citizen involvement, concern for the public interest, appreciation of individual rights, and even some old-fashioned political cunning," said Dr. Leeson.

"Contradictions? Tensions? Incompatibilities? That's what we're out to explore. Maybe in the process we'll happen across new ways of dealing with them and reconciling the demands of the present with the dreams of the future," she added.

One of the new ways just may be McAlister's "experiment" in Urban Form and Design.

URBAN FORM, from the viewpoint of the artist and the political scientist, is a frequent topic of conversation — and study — for Roger McAlister (left) assistant professor of art, and Sue Leeson, assistant professor of political science. McAlister teaches the experimental Urban Form and Design course in the new major field of Urban and Regional Government spearheaded by Dr. Leeson.

CAMPUS RELIGIOUS LIFE

Students - Tolerant and Searching

Editor's note:

From its founding by Methodist missionaries 130 years ago, Willamette University has maintained its Christian orientation, but without sectarian emphasis. Students represent many faiths and are encouraged to continue their religious affiliations. Although independently administered, Willamette is accredited as a senior college by the University Senate of the United Methodist Church.

With talk on the college campuses of the "Jesus Movement," "Spiritual Revolution," "Religious Reawakening," and other phrases signaling greater religious awareness, we asked a student to chronicle some of the student attitudes on religion at Willamette.

Sophomore Kathy Kaster, Aloha, Oregon, a former editor of the Willamette Collegian, interviewed many students for their opinions about campus religious life. Following is her report.

By Kathy Kaster

Student interest in religion is quite evident at Willamette today. It is evident in the number of religious oriented groups which have started or been rejuvenated. It is evident in the awareness that students express for the need to believe in something. And paradoxically, it is evident in student requests to abolish Willamette's requirement for one course in religion.

For the most part, students interviewed were willing to discuss their beliefs, offer opinions about the roles of the church and campus religious groups, the Jesus movement and other evangelistic thrusts, and the University's effect upon campus religious life.

Just as there has been an apparent "spiritual revolution" in colleges across the country, Willamette students in the past two or three years have shown a definite increase in interest regarding religious matters.

Joe Fuiten, a senior from Aloha who is considering following the footsteps of his father into the ministry, notes that "four years ago very little religious was happening on campus. In 1969, the Willamette Christian Body started forming. It sponsored the Sweet Jesus, Prince of Peace Rock Festival here last year, which made religion one of the main topics of conversation around here."

Another senior, Bob Fleishman, Palo Alto, detects a growing trend toward the Jesus movement and a change in the campus atmosphere.

"People are starting to think about where they are and it's creating a new awareness of 'What do I believe?' In the past, I don't think that question was raised by as many students," said Fleishman.

University Chaplain Phil Harder, who holds his doctorate in religion from the Claremont School of Theology, acknowledges a definite spiritual quest by large numbers of students, a quest with no particular label and one that is not definable by tradition or category.

Harder sees what he terms a "weird waiting" among students with much introspection going on since the period of social action two years ago. The growth of the Jesus movement and a renewed interest in the Bible he attributes to an outgrowth of this introspection or search for authority in spiritual matters.

Sophomore Margaret (Maggie) Mills, Seattle, picks up on the spiritual quest theme. A member of the Episcopalian Student Communion, she says "A lot of students depend upon themselves. The American ideal is 'I've got everything within me to go on.' It's hard for students to accept the fact that they can't find all the answers or handle everything. They're so sure of themselves they don't want to admit they fail. They consider Christianity a cop-out. They're going around in circles."

Other students also voice a need to depend upon something outside themselves. Freshman Peggy Roesch, Richland, Wash., comments, "Just reading the papers scares me to death. I reach toward religion as a security blanket. In religion, people find something that expresses themselves better than they can themselves."

Students are faced with a totally new world of technology and rapid change that their parents and grandparents never had to cope with. This technology has a direct bearing on students' religious beliefs.

Cindy Cutter, a sophomore from Sacramento who describes herself as an agnostic, says, "It's hard to believe in a God in heaven when you're up there too," in reference to space-age technology.

Also speaking of the effect of technology, sophomore Jerry Chan, Compton, Calif., states, "People in America have had a 'God's on our side' type of feeling with the progress of material things. Now our technology is taking over and scaring us. People say, 'What's this? God's on our side but look what's happening.' They can't hold onto old traditions anymore and there's soul searching. What is God if not the good American way of life? Maybe the American dream is no longer God's dream."

"Just reading the papers scares me to death.
I reach toward religion
as a security blanket.
In religion, people find something that expresses themselves better than they can themselves."

Senior Benny Cardiff, Silverton, notes that with all the changes going on, collegians in general have a deep-seated insecurity and void in their lives. He sees them trying to fill this void with religion after they find out that drugs, sex, carousing, and studying every hour of the day are only temporary ways of filling the void.

Some of the fundamentalist Christians on campus view the national rise in the use of drugs and drinking as fulfillments of Biblical prophecies indicating that the end of the world is near and that drug abuse as well as increased interest in the occult and mysticism are manifestations of Satan's increasing power.

Other students feel that the use of drugs and drinking are alternative means of filling a void in one's life. Maggie Mills says, "Drugs take the place of religion for some people. Drugs are a different way of coping but it's a body orientation rather than spiritual."

Even though they note a definite rise in religious interest, and especially in the Christian religion, most students do not feel this has been coupled with an equal rise in church attendance among the large Protestant churches. Chaplain Harder estimates that less than 10% of the student body attends church on a given Sunday.

Reasons given by students for this lack of interest in institutionalized religion vary. Cindy Cutter, who was born a Catholic, says, "The corruption in the Church back to the Middle Ages turns me off. Also, its prejudices against Indians, blacks and women. The Church accepts their money and uses them."

Several students expressed a distrust of the organized church because of church "inaction" toward ideals and principles which they set forth and should support.

To sophomore Don Sims, Compton, Calif., the church is dividing people. He says, "It's like race things, each church thinks it is better than another congregation but in reality they are all worshipping the same God."

Many students feel the greatest growth is in the more conservative, fundamentalist churches. Paul Parker, a senior from Eugene, explains this. "My church (Judson Baptist) really accepts college kids and treats them as human beings and adults; there's a real love there. That church is going to prosper as will others that can accept young people and offer them help. The liberal Protestant churches won't unless they change."

Another reason frequently mentioned for the movement to more fundamentalist churches was a desire to hear more Bible teachings without all the ritual. In other words, a more simple form of worship.

Perhaps the apparent declining interest in the institutional church has prompted a resurgence of smaller group meetings on campus, some carrying a label and some not.

Those with a label include the previously mentioned Willamette Christian Body and Episcopalian Student smaller Bible study living organizations.

WCB spokesman Fuiten says the group isn't aggressive, but rather encouraging Christian other students what is all about. To do this provides moral support and information about life.

Bible study and prayer aspects of Christianity on campus. Last year, it held daily prayer meetings at lunch hour and sponsored active Bible study groups. A prayer chain was different student prayer for about 12 hours each day. Bible study groups are :

The most ambitious group so far was last year's Jesus, Prince of Peace. Organizer Ric Carter from Palo Alto said, "Just having a success in Salem was wasn't a hard sell. It involved people sharing and music with the student body that day. People became Christians. People were turned on to it."

A distinction should be made between the members of the Jesus movement like those in the so-called "Jesus freaks."

"We still share
needs—communication, government and trying to make out of the world and in the future."

The term Jesus freaks is applied to those who have turned out of secular life to devote themselves to active evangelism. They are the people with Bible signs on a street corner, a very determined man Jesus. Most Willamette students whether involved with the movement or not, expressed the feeling that "holding" of people for turns them off to what has to say.

Members of WCB are casual, low-key approach emphasizing on letting one show through actions words. Cohen said, "It's becoming friends and natural."

Cardiff, a member of the Jesus movement, a group often been criticized as aggressive, says he's turned three people who actively to his approach. He describes a typical means of conversation about religion. "I have a few minutes. I share this book (Four Seasons with you and get your own)."

Fuiten stressed the importance of waiting and being another person is reached about Christ. One's in the same place he says.

Alumni Association Elections will be held at the annual meeting of the Association, May 13, 1972. Anyone wishing to provide the nominating committee with names of potential candidates to fill forthcoming vacancies should send nominations to the Director of Alumni Relations by not later than April 1, 1972. The following positions are to be filled: President elect (two-year term); Secretary (two-year term); and five members of the board (three-year terms).

A Constitutional Amendment, providing for the election of the Alumni Association's Executive Board Members and Officers by mail ballot, and providing for the election of student board members by the Student Senate, is proposed for adoption by the Association at its annual meeting.

Miami Triad 25th Reunion

Members of Beta Theta Pi, Phi Delta Theta and Sigma Chi invited back to the campus April 7-8. Details to come in a special mailing.

Alumni Citations

Any former student of Willamette University who has had a written recommendation submitted to the Director of Alumni Relations is eligible for consideration of this award, except those alumni who are present members of the Board of Trustees, officers of the Alumni Association and of the faculty, as well as holders of honorary degrees from Willamette University. An anonymous Alumni Citation Committee selects no more than five recipients on the basis of "outstanding achievements and services which reflect honor upon Willamette University." The spirit of this program, however, does insist that neither national nor regional fame or financial generosity shall preclude the honoring of an "unknown" alumnus whose qualifications personify the best in American citizenry and character.

The Annual Meeting of the Willamette University Alumni Association will be held May 13, 1972, in the University Center.

LETTERS

Semantics Revisited

Editor:

The letter in the October, 1971, issue of the Willamette Scene by Paul deLespinasse invites a rebuttal utilizing a distinction which Mr. deLespinasse himself has used in the past, the distinction between what should be and what should be done. For example, many people, having concluded that we should not be in Vietnam, further conclude that we should withdraw ourselves immediately. However, the fact that we should not be there in the first place does not necessarily imply that what should be done is to now withdraw ourselves instantaneously.

Similarly, there should not be a distinction between "races," but large numbers of people act "as if" there were. However, what should be done is not, as Mr. deLespinasse suggests, to suddenly act as if there weren't such a distinction. This rationalizes the problem out of existence.

What does it mean, for example, to treat "blacks" and "whites" equally? Should there be equal standards for admitting everyone to college? That certainly would eliminate the majority of blacks. Then let us equalize secondary education. But does this mean simply to begin treating blacks and whites equally, or does it not mean committing a disproportionately large segment of our resources to improving educational opportunities for blacks? This question is relevant to areas besides education and to minority groups besides blacks.

Thus, even though there should not be a racial distinction, what should be done is not to say that there is no such thing as race, and to frown patronizingly on those who talk as if there were. Instead, we should recognize that for all practical purposes, racial distinctions are and will continue to be made, and that certain groups of people have not received the full opportunity they deserve. Therefore, for the present we must direct our efforts squarely at these disadvantaged groups in a concerted effort to improve the quality of their lives. When this end is accomplished the "race" problem will truly cease to exist.

Greek Responds

Editor:

I would like to reply to Carl Bowman's letter (Oct., 1971) if I may. In it he calls the Greek system "a vehicle for the prolongation of adolescence" and "at best highly anachronistic." My argument is not in terms of the merits of the Greek system. Rather, it asks the question, how can Mr. Bowman know this?

The Greek system at Willamette, as all of us in it are aware, is quite different from that on any other campus we have seen. Therefore, it seems difficult for one to judge us who is not thoroughly familiar with present-day Willamette.

I wish to expand my comments to all critics of our fraternities and sororities. First, concerning those who have never been members: how are they to know what a Greek system is? My argument is based on the fact that a very large percent of those who have become members have stayed as members because they prefer that style of living to dorm or off-campus life (something which they have also experienced). Those who experience it, like it. The Greek system is obviously not meant for everyone. But it is meant for some of us. Why should those from without judge our organization as to its "relevance" or importance? It is important to that large portion of students who belong to Greek houses.

If the Greek system is to be criticized, let it be constructive criticism based on a knowledge of the system and its place on campus. The very important fact is that it serves a need for a large number of students. If there is to be "a major de-emphasis or total elimination of the fraternity-sorority system," I suggest that it should come as a result of students finding that it does not suit their needs, and not as a result of unsubstantiated pronouncements from without the system. Many of us consider the fraternity life the most valuable experience of our lives. Thank you.

Chi Omega Chapter Votes to Disband

As the Scene went to press, the campus community received official, national-office confirmation that Chi Omega sorority will be dissolved on the Willamette campus.

On January 13, the Willamette Chi O chapter voted to surrender its chapter at the end of the school year, apparently because of inability to maintain a sufficient occupancy level. The gray, colonial sorority building is only 62% occupied; 28 sorority members and two independents live in a house designed for 48.

The Chi O representative at the Panhellenic Rush Committee meeting reported that her sorority would not be rushing, and touched off a host of campus rumors. Most of the stories had to do with University commitment in regard to occupancy.

When the University took out a mortgage on the sorority houses, the Department of Housing and Urban Development required that all buildings be 90% occupied. HUD waived the 90% occupancy requirement late in 1971 at the University's request.

Dr. Jerry Whipple, Vice President for Student Affairs, said Willamette made the request to HUD in order to make legal the inability to maintain the required occupancy in some of the sororities. At the time, Willamette Greek houses simply were encountering the same drop in membership experienced by sororities and fraternities across the country. According to Dr. Whipple, the University will encourage and help sororities and fraternities to obtain residents, but will not require independent students to live in Greek houses against their wishes.

The announcement from Chi Omega's Cincinnati headquarters will increase speculation about future use of the building. Dr. Whipple said that the subject has not been discussed, but there probably will be a public meeting about it in March.

The Greek System was born on the Willamette campus 53 years ago when Beta Chi sorority was organized, later to become Pi Beta Phi. Chi Omega, which was established at the University of Arkansas in 1885, started up at Willamette on March 17, 1945. Willamette has four other national sororities, Alpha Chi Omega, Alpha Phi, Delta Gamma and Pi Beta Phi.

CLASS NOTES

ONCE UPON A TIME . . .

a young alumnus was asked to contribute to Willamette University's annual Alumni Loyalty Fund. He really wanted to do this, but his starting salary was barely enough to live on and the $5 or $10 he could afford to send seemed too small to solve his University's financial problems. Besides he didn't want to be identified with such a small gift. So he did not follow his heart and he sent nothing. His University lost out. (If his 300 classmates followed suit, the University lost $1,500-$3,000 per year — enough to provide three sizeable scholarships.)

Young Alumnus grew and prospered to become an older alumnus and was solicited three times a year by his alma mater for funds. Now he really wanted to respond because he realized the value of his education.

He now knew that the gifts of others had provided the buildings, scholarships, and library books that made his education possible at less than actual cost. Still, his mortgage, car payments, and children's expenses weighed upon him and he honestly felt that he could only spare but $10-$25 per year to his University. This, for some strange reason, made a man of his status appear as a cheapskate in his own eyes. Obviously, this size gift would not solve his University's problems — so he sent nothing — even though he meant to. Once again, his University was the loser. (If his classmates followed suit, the University lost the equivalent of one-half the salary of an instructor each year.)

On his 25th class reunion, Mr. Average Alumnus had mellowed a bit. He now realized that he would not become president of his company, but it no longer bothered him. He wasn't particularly happy, however, over a few long-haired students and a new permissive attitude on his old campus. Rock music did not send him. But on the other hand, he didn't particularly understand the thinking of his own children either who somehow or other had developed minds of their own. Mr. Average Alumnus grumped a bit but finally decided to send $25 to his University. Maybe he could afford more, but he decided that's all they would get. Besides, by now he couldn't tell whether this was a worthwhile gift or not. (He had no way of knowing that $25 was the average gift to the Alumni Loyalty Fund — and that $123 was the average alumnus gift for all purposes — and — that gifts range from $2 to thousands of dollars in size.)

But he followed his inclinations and his University won out. The university was overjoyed and returned a prompt and warm thank you letter containing a donor card entitling him to special discounts for cultural and athletic events whenever he returns to the campus. He didn't think he'd be visiting the campus very often, but he thought it was kind of nice. The old school, now 130 years old, really did appreciate his gift. Of course, the Alumni Director was overjoyed too, because one new alumni contribution had been received. This gift would then be matched dollar for dollar by the Collins Foundation. (And each year Mr. Average Alumnus increases the amount of his annual gift to the Alumni Loyalty Fund, the Foundation will match the increase.) And besides, his gifts, when added to others, would help provide the leverage needed to seek the outside support of corporations, foundations and friends of the University. They would help provide an answer to the question, "What are your own alumni doing to support you?"

Next year Mr. Average Alumnus found himself actually reading the fund raising literature sent by his University and he decided to join the Century Club which honors those making gifts of $100 or more by providing free athletic tickets and being guests of the University President at the annual Alumni Banquet. It not only didn't hurt, but it was actually fun to identify with the success of independent education at a time when the government and taxes seemed to be intruding into more and more facets of his life. He followed his heart and his head and his college was a winner.

During a coffee break at the University on Alumni Day, the Alumni Director reminisced about what would have happened if the 80% of alumni (National average) who do not support their college actually made the small gifts they can afford but for some reason do not.

With 9,000 alumni, Willamette lost 7,000 gifts per year during the last 20 years alone. At simply $10 per gift per year this cost the University $1,400,000, enough to pay off the balance needed for the new Physical Education and Recreation Center (it replaces one built in 1923 which will become a drama and art facility), complete the $250,000 campaign for the law library, provide $250,000 for the undergraduate library and establish a $500,000 scholarship fund.

Moral — Give into the urge and send your gift regardless of size. Don't give until it hurts — but do give until it feels good. It will aid your digestion and your Willamette University will be grateful — everyone wins.

Religious life at Willamette

'Over 30's' See it Varied, Valid

(And, how do the "over-30's" see religious life on the Willamette campus and how do they react to it? THE WILLAMETTE SCENE talked with six informed adults to get an answer.)

THE STUDENT AFFAIRS VP

"Young people today like eyeball to eyeball relationships."

"The older generation insists that things are as they ought to be rather than as they are."

The speaker is crew-cut Dr. Jerry Whipple, Vice President for Student Affairs at Willamette. Dr. Whipple does not respond quickly to questions of a serious nature, and he obviously considers religious questions to be such. Looking upward, he weighs each question.

Dr. Whipple, who smilingly forecasts that his obituary will reveal "all the Methodist credentials," reports that a certain number of students — sons and daughters of so-called pillars of the church — arrive on campus desirous of abandoning traditional religious practices. He believes that the primary religious function of Student Affairs might be simply to retain openness and to encourage students in their religious lives.

He says, "One of the difficulties is that people tend to use the wrong criteria to determine whether a campus has a Christian atmosphere or a religious atmosphere. We cannot fail to recognize the validity of new forms — to recognize the spirit of brotherhood, the relationship of music, and the importance of touching and doing things like sitting on the floor instead of on chairs."

He thinks that today's youth are much closer to the cutting edge of morality, pointing to the fact that students were the leaders in questioning the whole Vietnam situation. Are today's students immoral? Absolutely not. "Their music and their reading material refutes charges of immorality. Willamette students are very concerned about where they stand in relationship to man and God."

Today, one hears that more and more students are attracted to Christian fundamentalism. Jerry Whipple finds that Willamette students vary greatly in regards to fundamentalism. One might protest the teaching of the theory of evolution, whereas another has completely broken with traditional teachings.

But, Willamette does have a special character as far as religious life is concerned; to label Willamette as secular would be inaccurate. "It is important that the question of religion is even pertinent at Willamette. It would not be pertinent at many campuses. It is not a case of indifference here."

When asked how Willamette is different from other colleges, Dr. Whipple says that part of the difference is residual. He refers to the openness of Willamette religious discussion over the years, the willingness of faculty to discuss religion as being pertinent.

"We cannot fail . . . to recognize the spirit of brotherhood, the relationship of music, and the importance of touching and doing things like sitting on the floor instead of on chairs."

the selection of faculty on the basis of academics and of their concern for student needs. He believes that the varied viewpoints on our campus help in many ways because they assure Willamette of the broad spectrum.

A PHILOSOPHY PROFESSOR

An articulate spokesman for one end of that spectrum is Dr. Milton Hunnex, Chairman of the Philosophy Department. He also provides an excellent example of a faculty member being willing to help students in the religious sphere. Because he does not mix his teaching duties with his personal convictions, some students might be surprised to learn that their philosophy professor is an outspoken evangelical Christian. Professor Hunnex has no official religious status as far as the students on campus are concerned, but some evangelical students tend to think of him as a faculty friend. In several instances, he has helped sponsor Christian activities at Willamette.

Asked to describe the campus "evangelicals," Milton Hunnex gazed out of his Waller Hall window, fingers pressed together: "Evangelicals place stress on three things: (1) personal conversion, (2) biblical authority and (3) orthodoxy." He mentioned the Campus Crusade for Christ and Inter-Varsity as being two strong evangelical groups on campus. "However," he added, "Any group that can win commitments is fine with me."

Because of their prominence on many campuses, the evangelicals usually are mentioned when campus religious life is discussed. What puzzles many is their conversation about being "born again" and their enthusiasm and genuineness in talking about their faith. The professor believes that, when a person opens himself to Christ, is "born again," a supernatural act takes place. Something supernatural happens upon conversion so that a person has an extraordinary capacity to do what he could not do before. For example, a student might find that he can love and forgive in situations where this was previously impossible. Accountability for the evangelical experience is difficult because only the person experiencing Christ truly has the knowledge.

Tucked among hundred of philosophy works in his office is his own book, Existentialism and Christian Belief. The Hunnex book attacks the liberal Christian viewpoint and, in the process, disagrees with renowned liberal theologians like Bonhoeffer, Tillich, Bultmann, Robinson, Altizer, and others who have preached a new theology to replace the old. He says, "It is not a question of a new or old theology, but a question of the same gospel or no gospel at all."

A NEARBY MINISTER

as a mediator, one doesn't get the impression of a clearcut separation between liberal and conservative students.

As a University trustee and pastor of the old-as-Willamette First United Methodist Church two blocks from campus, the soft-spoken Reverend Mr. Albertson knows and has known many Willamette students. He warns against categorizing students into just a couple of pigeon holes, believing instead that the campus religious scene is as broad as that of the general community. He also warns that to generalize in this whole area is dangerous, that the whole Jesus isn't being presented by just one group.

If student interest in the institutional church isn't too strong, Dr. Albertson isn't too disturbed. He says he and his fellow students didn't have much time for church when he was in college. However, the pastor is quick to add that some students might stay away due to a misunderstanding of the role of the church; he believes the institutional church does see concerns and does serve in many ways. Perhaps some of our youth are turned off by the church because of lack of time, apathy or inertia and not because they have thoroughly investigated the church and found it irrelevant.

About 20 to 30 Willamette students attend his church every Sunday, and approximately 100 different students have worshipped there since school opened in the fall. Still, Gene Albertson senses the need for the University community and the church to be closer together.

How do students who are not involved in the Jesus movement feel about it?

Becky Rudnick, who is Jewish, says, "It's so weird here. Everyone's so Waspish. WU is so typical, so unbelievably typical. Most everyone here has fundamentalist Protestant viewpoints. Sometimes I get the feeling, especially when people talk to me about why I'm different because I'm Jewish, that people tend to notice it and dwell on it. It's funny when you know that all the kids around you have been taught that Jesus Christ is the only means to salvation and that all unbaptized are damned. And I'm not baptized. I hate the feeling that people are thinking 'Gee, poor Rebecca. I'm not going to see her in Heaven.' I wouldn't want someone worrying about me."

Sims, President of the Black Student Union, sees the campus religious movement more negatively, as something which divides people further into cliques and isolates them. He also criticizes the Jesus movement for what he sees as hypocrisy.

"In discussions down the hall, they say material things aren't necessary. Yet, they are still in school striving for positions in society and security. They're not going after the religious life they talk about. They are going to have to step on people in the positions they're seeking and they shouldn't really want to step on people. They are dedicated to a 'comfortable life' and 'time is money' concept, and they will have to give up the Christian thing."

"Every class has made me look at my own faith, and I still believe what I believed when I came. The quicker pace challenges what you believe, but I feel my belief has been reinforced."

In a more positive light, Keith Williams, a member of the Bahai Faith, says, "When religion becomes obsolete, people look to other things for spiritual needs. With the Jesus movement, people are realizing need for something. I look at the Jesus movement as a step before people realize the validity of the Bahai Faith as the answer to this day and age."

He explains that the Bahai Faith is a relatively new religion that claims to be the successor to Christianity and all prior religions, based upon the prophecies of Baha'ulla, a 19th Century prophet.

Not all students exhibiting religious fervor are involved in the Jesus movement or an organized church. Jerry Chan describes his beliefs saying, "I developed my own idea of God. I see Him in people and this earth. He exists by what I see in the world. It's not something cultural. It inspires me and gets more complicated as I learn more about the world. I have to make it all fit because God is something that encompasses the whole world. I was born and lived in Watts, a 3-D background. How can you believe in God in Watts in the middle of oppression? You've got contradicting religions but there are universal truths I look for, a kind of a quest for knowledge to see God."

Marilyn Rapp says she is an atheist and explains by saying she sees no need or reason for there to be a God. "Life, at least a good part of it, is a chemical reaction, a continuing chemical reaction that started by coincidence."

What are some of the effects Willamette has had on student beliefs? Students involved in the Jesus movement stress the point that the size and closeness of Willamette have made it easier for them to identify one another and give each other needed support.

Peggy Roesch and Becky Rudnick, both Jewish, offer their views on Willamette's effect upon them.

"Every class has made me look at my own faith and I still believe what I believed when I came. The quicker pace challenges what you believe but I feel my belief has been reinforced," says Peggy. "I wasn't super-Jewish before I came here but now I'm more Jewish because I want to be and have had to think about my belief in it," adds Becky.

Also speaking of Willamette's atmosphere and effect on religious beliefs, Don Sims comments, "Willamette is too sheltered. The pace is really slow, there are no real problems to worry about. It's less real here than home. I don't see too much concern for people here."

Cohen said he considers Willamette "a pagan or secular school," while Cardiff said it is more of a matter of semantics. "The school is church-associated, but it is not Christian in the sense of Christ in one. I'm personally disappointed in the religion department's lack of presenting the true Christ in a personal way students can relate to. The trend is to be too apologetic," said Cardiff.

After taking a survey of various academic needs last fall, a student commission asked for the abolition of the religion requirement for graduation at Willamette and a restructuring of the religion department curriculum. Some 43% of the 178 students polled thought the requirement should be abolished, 38% voted for modification and 19% for retention.

Chaplain Harder doesn't see the controversy as reflecting a decrease in interest in religion, but rather a student rebellion against being told what to do. "Some see it as an extension of parental authority into a very private matter," he said.

Jerry Chan said, "You don't need a school to help religion." Students appear more interested in discovering religion for themselves and do not want religion pushed upon them. Some interpret the religion requirement as being a "push," but others, like Peggy Roesch, disagree.

"I wouldn't abolish the religion requirement. You must understand people's religion to understand them. We need more sources of religious information and more opportunities to get questions answered," she said.

Keith Williams even expressed the opinion that it would be nice to have the option of majoring in theology with more emphasis on teaching all religions as well as the Christian religion.

While the requirement question is still to be resolved, students interviewed seemed to generally agree that "whatever is right for the individual" is the proper approach. This has produced a very open religious atmosphere on campus. Students are interested in religion, but regard it as something deeply personal and they seem increasingly more tolerant of others' beliefs.

Willamette's apparent lack of a strong religious emphasis appears as more of an asset than a liability to today's student.

In this light, Harder views his role as one "to bring people together who care about one another. We have to begin where we're living—searching for a meaningful life—and move from there to a Christian or non-Christian interpretation."

"But we still share common needs—communicating, learning, governing and trying to make sense out of the world now and in the future," he concluded.

Student Tribute to Old WU

Editor's note:

One of the highlights of Willamette University's 130th anniversary observance the week of Feb. 1-5 was the following student tribute to Willamette. Ernie Ankrim, a senior economics major from LaHabra, Calif., expressed his "thank you" during a special convocation in Waller Hall.

BY ERNIE ANKRIM '72

You've all heard the story before—Willamette, oldest University west of the Missouri River—130 years old Feb. 1. But overworked facts sometimes have a way of repeating themselves into oblivion. How old is 130 years? Thinking back to our high school history courses we realize that Abraham Lincoln 130 years ago was a struggling young lawyer in Illinois.

A child fortunate enough to be born in 1842 would have been a young adult of 18 and no doubt fighting in the opening days of the Civil War. And it would be 17 years after the birth of Willamette that Charles Darwin would publish his theory of evolution.

And while the age of Willamette is something to honor, the men and women who have passed through these halls add significance beyond the powers of any calendar. There are Willamette graduates all over the world in every walk of life—on every continent including Antarctica.

Our alumni have designed and built great dams, written text books for our younger brothers and sisters and for us, been our representatives, not only in state and local government, but have played great roles in the United States Congress and in the United Nations.

Even now Oregon's two Senators, Mark Hatfield and Bob Packwood, are graduates of Willamette. Of course, the Willamette that meant so much to Senators Hatfield and Packwood is not the Willamette University I'll be leaving this May.

Our campus has changed from a one-building, 12-room structure to the present arrangement of more than two dozen buildings that educate, house and even entertain the members of the campus community.

Classes of just three years ago were not able to enjoy the facilities of our University Center, while in just a few years the same will be said of my class with reference to the Physical Education and Recreation Center.

But even if Willamette

THE COLLEGE PRESIDENT

The relationship of church and campus was the subject of a recent sermon-dialogue between Dr. Albertson and Willamette President Roger Fritz. Dr. Fritz, who occasionally preaches in local churches, believes that both the church and the university must show more initiative in dealing with the problems of youth. He pleads for elimination of segregation by age in churches and on campus.

The President asked the congregation members why they weren't with young people more often, why they didn't use the church as an opportunity to be with students. He promised that Willamette would work harder to bridge the gap—and he asked the congregation to do likewise.

In his comments, President Fritz praised Willamette students as "more sensitive to human values and Christian concerns than previous generations." He voiced the opinion that students would accept more invitations to become actively involved with church adults if the adults convey to them the feeling that they are really wanted and needed.

THE CAMPUS CHAPLAIN

Dr. Phil Harder, campus chaplain and one of three teachers in the Department of Religion, probably agrees with President Fritz about the sensitivity of students and with Dr.

Albertson about the variety in campus religion.

As a teacher, counselor, and organizer-coordinator of campus religious activities, Phil Harder displays an exceptional zeal for humanizing our technological world. Whether twisting in empathy with a Bearcat wrestler or chatting with a blue-jeaned sorority girl, he seems constantly aware that a closeness can and should be developed between any two human beings.

The chaplain sees a minority of students as the traditional church-going, bible-reading, prayer-meeting type. The majority appears primarily concerned with discovering a meaningful system of values.

The Harder style with students is informal and unstructured, typified in the Bread and Soup banquets scheduled periodically by his office. Here, students simply gather for a meal; on-campus students supply the soup, off-campus students bring the bread. The idea is to encourage students toward an inclusive community rather than an exclusive one.

The chaplain's office sponsors regular events like the annual, do-it-yourself Christmas Festival and special affairs such as participation in the Nov. 3 Fast to Save a People to aid Pakistani refugees. Approximately 500 students participated in the latter.

WILLAMETTE SCENE

Avoiding PITFALLS in Campaign Rhetoric

A presidential election, or what one commentator has called the "quadrennial madness," is upon us once again. The verbal persuasion used by candidates is often fraught with fallacies. The Willamette Scene asked Dr. Howard Runkel, professor of rhetoric and public address at the University, to remind voters of the pitfalls in campaign rhetoric. He responded with the following article on how politicians frequently ignore the question.

By

countless campaign speeches as obstacles to straight-thinking.

Six Fallacies

The following six fallacies of ignoring the question, best known by their Latin labels, are most frequently encountered:

Most familiar and colorful is the Argumentum ad hominem. This is invective, or name-calling. Too often the candidate will spend himself denouncing the opponent while leaving his arguments unchallenged. Of unhappy memory are the Army-McCarthy hearings of the 1950's when "traitor," "tainted-thinking intellectual," "stooge of the Kremlin" and "Moscow-directed character assassin" were hurled by one side while the other fired back with "hit and run politician," "base wretch," and "you need a psychiatrist." Of more current concern is the character-assassination that has marred consideration of Supreme Court nominees in recent years. In both of these instances millions of Americans would have profited far more from an exchange of evidence and logical reasoning.

Some labelling is justified in public address on the grounds of accurate description and vividness — the two Roosevelts among the presidents were especially effective in this. But both erred on occasion as when the irrepressible Theodore named many prominent contemporaries to membership in his Ananias Club for liars and Franklin denounced the "money-changers in the temples." Nobody questioned the impact of these assertions when they were spoken; everybody should have questioned what logical analysis and proof were involved in each.

Perhaps the best word on this subject comes from the ancient Chinese who observed that in any argument "the man who calls the first name is admitting he has run out of ideas."

Flattery Fools

The Argumentum ad populum (Eulogy of the People) is another way of talking around the point. This is the case of the speaker who praises his audience at the expense of analysis and argument. Some campaigners find this tempting because so many listeners are immediately responsive to flattery. Of course, nobody is enlightened.

A few years ago a thousand people stood in front of the Marion County Courthouse and listened to a candidate for the Presidential nomination spend his precious fifteen-minute stop telling them how beautiful a life style they had developed in "this veritable Garden of Eden which is your Willamette Valley" and how "politically advanced and wise in their decision-making Oregonians have typically been since their statehood" and so on and on. He did not attempt to introduce, much less develop, any rationale for his program or logically refute the claims of his opponents for office.

It was a New York City mayor who habitually began reading his speeches to audiences. After several minutes of this he would crumple up his "manuscript," lean forward with a disarming smile and say "you're too intelligent an audience to have to listen to a read speech. I'm just going to talk with you eye to eye and heart to heart." The rest of his remarks were pure flattery that charmed his listeners. One of the mayor's aides later revealed that the crumpled up "manuscript" was only an unused laundry sheet!

Sincere expressions of courtesy at the beginning of a campaign address are certainly in order. They should never be extended to the neglect of the business at hand — the thoughtful discussion of the campaign issues.

Emotional Substitute

In some ways the most inclusive of all is the Argumentum ad misericordiam, or appeal to humor, sympathy or fear. Each of these elements is vital in effective speaking but it must never be allowed to become an emotional substitute for argument. Unfortunately, some of the best vote-getters in American history have been those who have relied more on wit than on information. Others have shamelessly appealed for votes by displaying an empty sleeve from the battlefield or portraying their humble origins. Worst are those who resort to "mindless fear" in a bid for election.

It is much easier to frighten audiences with warnings of war or depression as a result of electing candidate than it is to present a critical analysis of each aspect of his program. Irresponsible predictions of continuing involvement in foreign wars after the Armistice frightened Americans into rejecting the idealism of Woodrow Wilson. Many historians declare that we are still paying a fearful price for this turn of policy a half century ago.

The argumentum ad misericordiam can be very simply effective because it captures the emotions. Much more difficult is the development of a logical argument that captures the mind.

Tradition and Custom

In some ways the fallacy that most reveals audience psychology is the Argumentum ad verecundiam — the appeal to tradition and custom. We find comfort and security in what is and always has been. The office-seeker who links his cause to deep-felt attachments certainly takes the course of least resistance. One has only to recall the basis of most opposition to a third term for the President — simply that "George Washington didn't want it." The first President's reasons and their relevance to the Twentieth Century were seldom if ever examined! When in 1953 a board of selected artists in Salem proposed a statue of Venus as "a monument in memory of the early Oregon pioneers" many citizens erupted in indignation at this break from the customary rugged woodsmen and sunbonneted maidens sculptured in and around the capitol. Venus was rejected out of hand even before she had been displayed in the city!

Enslavement to tradition makes us resolve many questions even before investigation of the issues. Probably the Golden Mean is to avoid the extremes of change for change's sake on the one hand and resistance to change because it is change on the other.

Appeal to Ignorance

Especially pernicious is the Argumentum ad ignorantiam — the appeal to the ignorance of the audience. Here the speaker tries to prove not the truth or falsity of the argument itself but the fact that the people are ignorant of it. He is saying, "you have no information to prove this proposition so therefore the proposition is false." Shakespeare's "rumor with her thousand tongues" is often no more soundly based than this. The gossip which soils social relationships is frequently ad ignorantiam. Certainly attempts to brand political enemies "John Birchers," "Commies" or "KuKluxers" often embody this fallacy.

The voter owes it to himself and his country to discount all claims which rest on no stronger base than the intellectually barren appeal to that which he does not know.

"Might Makes Right"

The last of these six fallacies of avoiding the question is the Argumentum ad baculum. This derives its name from the "baculus," the bishop's rod of authority in church ceremonials. In modern language it signifies the argument that "might makes right." The fellow who "pulls his rank" or "throws his weight around" is guilty of this fallacy. The parent who curtly rejects all questions of his child with "do it because I say so" is as much relying on this fallacy as he is opening a new gap between the generations. Hitler tried to bully Belgium, the Netherlands and other small countries into surrender rather than resist the Nazi invasions. To him the Germans were the stronger so no argument about the principles involved in conflict were necessary.

It is unpleasant to believe that this fallacy could be encountered in an election in a democratic society. But the memories of Huey Long in Louisiana and Mayor Frank ("I am the law") Hague in Jersey City, among others, are still fresh. To their assertion that "might makes right" Abraham Lincoln had the answer in his celebrated challenge to voters in New York City in 1860: "Let us have faith that right makes might; and in that faith let us to the end dare to do our duty as we understand it."

Such must be the ultimate goal of every voter in this year of Presidential choice — to understand what is right by becoming informed; to discount campaign oratory that does not bear upon the question at hand; and, finally, to get out and vote — the highest duty of every citizen in our democracy in this or any time.

A RELIGION TEACHER

Dr. Norman Huffman's exposure to student religious views comes only under the bright lights of the classroom. As chairman of the religion department since 1946, he has taught the much-discussed war babies and some of their parents. Dr. Huffman prefers to restrict his comments to academics; however, the very nature of his academic duties gives him insight into student religious life.

In his opinion, students are more secular today because their homes and their pre-college schooling are more secular. He cites the relative lack of biblical knowledge and a general religious naivete as results of this secular environment. Some students literally discover religion on campus — they are converted here; among the converted, there are those who have difficulty accepting the fact that there are others who were raised as Christians and don't need conversion.

Conversion is not an objective of this pleasant professor. Student intellectual inquiry is. Fortunately, he has discovered that the trend toward a more secular home life has not stifled intellectual interest in religion.

Dr. Huffman says he will never force an opinion, but he will state his opinion, if asked. Do students ever give him a hard time about his classroom subject matter? Occasionally. Who — Jews or maybe Catholics? No, no problem there. It's usually a student from a dogmatic fundamentalist denomination. Can you tell which students are Jewish or Catholic? Often, yes; questions frequently reveal religious upbringing.

Asking Dr. Huffman if he believes Willamette should have a required religion course may seem to be a rhetorical question. Yes, he does. The study of religion is too relevant to a knowledge of man for a student to ignore it. He wonders how many students who voted against the religion requirement had taken a religion course. His manner suggests confidence in classroom interest in religion as taught at Willamette.

Six men who know a lot about students and religion have talked about students and religion at Willamette. Is religion alive and well at Willamette? Perhaps, as Jerry Whipple suggested, it depends upon the criteria the inquirer uses. — Ralph Wright

The Will is the Way

The way we continually greet one another with a hearty "How are you?" suggests that we view our physical health as the most important thing in the world. Perhaps it is.

But there is another kind of "health" that is not far behind in importance, and that is the state of our legal affairs, a cornerstone of which is the arrangements we have made to provide for our dependents and for the orderly disposal of our property according to our wishes in the event of our death.

Where There Is NO Will the State Has a Way

Many people think: I don't care what happens to my property after I'm gone. Or: it doesn't make any difference, since the State will apportion it the way I want it anyway.

This is hardly a prudent attitude. It can mean that someone whom you would not dream of hurting gets hurt. Or that someone may get your property whom you would not want to have it at all. It also means that your church, Willamette University, and other causes to which you have contributed during your lifetime will not get one penny from your estate, however much you would have liked them to have something.

Let us say that you die without a will, leaving minor children. You may assume that automatically your wife will have charge of them. Not so. She will have to be appointed their guardian by the Court, and she will have to report to the Court every year on how she has cared for them and their property — if indeed the Court does not appoint someone else the guardian of their property. In effect, the Court becomes a surrogate father.

Or suppose you have no children. Everything then will go to your wife, even though you might wish your parents or other persons to receive something. In short, the inflexible processes of the law dispose of your property regardless of your wishes.

If you do not find that to your liking, then — and here is one of the few places where you are permitted to do this — you may, so to speak, "take the law into your own hands." You do this when you write a will. Who can resist writing his own law?

Making Your Will

Though you may "make your own law," it is not really a do-it-yourself proposition. True, a self-written will may be valid, but it is always desirable to have legal counsel do the writing, because sooner or later the instrument will have to be offered before a court for "probate," or testing, and the language must stand up under the scrutiny of the court.

The important thing is this: by writing a will you make the decisions as to who will care for your children, who will inherit your property, and you can arrange your affairs to keep taxes at a minimum. Remember that the federal estate tax runs up as high as 77% and the Oregon inheritance tax will be in addition to this.

Who can make a will? In Oregon, anyone who is mentally competent and at least 18 years old can and should make a will, even though there may be very little property to dispose of. It saves trouble in the long run.

And the Greatest of These . . .

After you have provided for those who need your support and for others whom you wish to remember with specific bequests, it is a generous and charitable thing to remember those causes to which you have contributed during your lifetime and leave them a devise or bequest, either for their general use or for a specified purpose.

It is the established policy of Willamette University that where property is devised or bequeathed to the University, the trustees will scrupulously honor the wishes of the donor as to its disposition and use.

Gifts may be designated for particular purposes, such as endowment, scholarships, student loans, etc., and may be named in honor of or in remembrance of designated persons.

Such gifts are encouraged by federal and state tax laws which permit unlimited deductions for charitable gifts. Thus if you leave all your estate to the University (or other qualified charities) there is no tax whatsoever on your estate. Or, if you do not leave all to charity but do make charitable bequests, the value of each bequest comes off the "top" of your estate, thereby reducing the over-all tax liability. For example, a bequest of $100,000 from a very large estate (one, say, in the 90% combined federal and state brackets) actually "costs" the estate only $10,000, the other $90,000 of the gift being made up from what the government "forgives" in taxes. Many of us complain that what we hand over to the government in taxes is not spent as we would like it. By making substantial charitable bequests in our wills we can determine in effect exactly how our tax money is spent.

A word of caution: Gifts should be made to the University in its legal name, which is Willamette University, an Oregon Corporation located in Salem. The word "trust" or phrases such as "my trustee" should not be used, in order to avoid any implication of creating a trust or private foundation. (See Form of Devise and Bequest at right. If you do desire to create a trust, note the requirements in the section below on "testamentary trusts.")

Testamentary Trusts

Frequently donors wish to leave property to the University but wish to have a surviving spouse or other person receive income from it for life before it goes to the University. This is accomplished by creating what is called a testamentary charitable remainder trust.

Before 1969 this was comparatively easy, a short trust instrument expressing the donor's wishes being incorporated as part of his will. Since the Tax Reform Act of 1969, however, such instruments have to be very strictly drawn to conform to the Internal Revenue Code and Regulations. For example, the trust must be either a Charitable Remainder Annuity Trust or Unitrust. This requires lengthy legal language to be written into the will, but without it there are very severe tax penalties.

However, if you are contemplating making such a trust, there is a convenient way to avoid burdening your will with the required legal language. You may simply create now, during your lifetime, an inter vivos or "living" trust (which must be a Unitrust), funding it with any amount of cash or other assets. Then, with merely a line or two in your will, you can specify assets to be added from your estate to the Unitrust to provide income to the life beneficiary, after which the remainder is to go to Willamette University or other charity.

Preparation of a trust instrument is the responsibility of your personal counsel. However, the University will be glad to assist him by furnishing specimen trust instruments. If you contemplate naming the University as trustee, it is suggested you have your attorney check with the Development Office.

The University will be happy to assist you and your counsel in planning your gift. Address:

never added another building it would be changing nonetheless . . .

When I was a freshman here convocation speakers visited the campus every Wednesday and attendance was required . . .

But today our voluntary University convocations have been well received while promoting honest discussion. They have been both a credit to the University and those who have worked so hard on them.

So while there may be debate among thoughtful men over the University's rate of change, no one can question the existence of change and the continued need for it.

The one idea that is constantly expressed is that young people most of all want to reform the world. The world is different now than it was when our parents were young. Some things have changed for the better—when our parents were younger as many as 20,000 persons died in one year of polio. Last year one person died.

Some things have changed for the worse—when our parents were young the only place unsafe to breathe the air was in the bottom of a coal mine.

Some things have not changed—only the enemy has.

But as students here in a small school with relatively few problems we are afforded the luxury of idealism. It's our right to hope, since it will be for us to provide the hope for the future. That's what makes the college student, you and me, different than many other people.

We don't have to worry about ourselves as much as others do. Survival is not as uncertain as it is for some in Chicago, New York—Viet Nam. The responsibilities of this privilege grow greater with every passing six o'clock news. Just like everything else, with freedoms come responsibilities; and we are the most free students this University has ever seen. As a result we are the students who owe the most in our responsibilities to others.

Every day our disciplines become more advanced. Courses taught in high schools today were University material 15 years ago. For the first time in our country's history nearly every member of the student body at Willamette will be able to vote for our nation's President this coming November. Students are being heard on nearly every decision-making level of the University.

We have all the tools and we're going to have more—classes will be more sophisticated, young people will be a greater determining factor in government, and students will be more than just heard when it comes to University decisions. But with all of these there will be an even greater burden on us for responsible and thoughtful change.

I believe in the freedom and privileges granted me, and I welcome the responsibilities that accompany them as I'm sure most of us here do. I also believe students of the next years will deserve more freedoms to the extent they use their education to develop the "habit of right choice."

As students, though, we must do more than just hope as a child dreams. We must match that hope with concerned effort. It's just some stroke of luck that we're here as students—that we were lucky enough to be born here rather than somewhere else, lucky that we were fed while others starved. Those are just the breaks.

But now that we are here, we owe a great deal for all we've been given. We were born with the intellect and given the facilities and the freedoms to effect change for the good of all.

We owe it to ourselves and our consciences to make the best effort to right what we can.

We owe to the world hard work to insure our children fewer problems than we face now — and to Willamette we owe a "thank you" for giving us the atmosphere in which we prepare ourselves for tomorrow.

This our tribute and our pledge to Willamette University on her 130th birthday.
