Grant from Shell Foundation

For the fourth straight year, Willamette University has received a "Shell Assists" grant of $1,500 from the Shell Companies Foundation to be used by three different areas on campus.

In 1958 this foundation established the program of Shell Assists. Under the program each of a number of privately supported colleges or universities receives a $1,500 donation.

University president G. Herbert Smith announced acceptance of the gift and indicated the three uses: (1) to provide for equipment for the new science wing, (2) bolster general faculty development and (3) for use by the chemistry department.

In the past Shell Assists have been used to increase facilities in science, encourage faculty travel and special research, and for discretionary use of the chemistry department.

High School Students invited to Preview Day

High school seniors from Oregon, Washington, California and Idaho were invited to Willamette for the February 15 Willamette University Preview Day.

Richard Yocum, dean of admissions and registrar, planned a full day's program including speeches, sample college lectures, meetings with professors and informal visits with Willamette students.

Advance registrations indicated that over 300 high school students would attend the Preview.

Dr. Furlong directs Juvenile Court Conference

Dr. Robert E. Furlong, Willamette Law School professor, served as director of a three-day work conference of Oregon juvenile court judges and county juvenile officers at the Hilton Hotel in Portland in mid-January.

The conference was conducted under the auspices of the National Council of Juvenile Court Judges. It was a part of a three-year program being developed under a grant from the National Institute of Mental Health.

Dr. Furlong said the key word for the conference was its title, "Work." He commented, "We provided a very intense learning experience for all concerned. Even the dinner dance was a working item. The Moreland Players of Portland presented a demonstration skit permeated with thought-provoking situations occurring in the operations of a juvenile court. The skit was created in New York by professional writers for the National Council on Crime and Delinquency."

Among Willamette Law School alumni appearing on the conference program were Joseph B. Felton, Law '33, judge of the domestic relations court in Marion County, and William F. McAllister, Law '28, Chief Justice of the Oregon Supreme Court.

JESSI, CASSI slated for Willamette

Willamette has been selected as host university for two summer institutes sponsored by Scientists of Tomorrow.

A Junior Engineers' and Scientists' Summer Institute (JESSI) for girls is scheduled for Willamette June 14-27, and will be followed immediately by a Communications Arts and Science Summer Institute (CASSI) for boys and girls June 28-July 11. The Institutes are for students who will have just completed their junior and senior years in high school.

This marks the third consecutive year for a JESSI program at Willamette. JESSI is designed to help students determine whether or not they should plan a career in the scientific fields.

CASSI also incorporates some career overtones, but its primary purpose is to alert students to the highlights and fine points of individual, group and mass communications.

While JESSI is a relatively well-established program nationally, this is the first year for CASSI nationwide. The CASSI session at Willamette is for students from 11 Western states.

Coe Foundation picks Willamette again

A six-week Institute of American Studies, sponsored by the Coe Foundation of New York, will be conducted on the Willamette campus for the second consecutive year, beginning June 15.

High school teachers of social studies from Oregon, Washington, Idaho and Alaska are eligible for the program. The Coe Foundation provides 25 resident and a limited number of non-resident fellowship grants.

Dr. Howard R. Runkel, who will direct this year's Institute program at Willamette, said its purpose will be to increase professional preparation for selected teachers, encourage a fuller understanding of the American heritage, and enrich appreciation of American ideas and ideals.

Five Willamette professors will serve as teachers for the Institute program. Subjects will cover history, political science, economics and government.

Christian Resource Week Observed

The Bible was the most-used textbook on the Willamette campus during the week of February 9-15. The occasion was the annual Willamette University Christian Resource Week, theme of which was "The Bible's Place Today."

Perhaps the most provocative Bible-study events of the Week were the discussion groups in the campus living organizations. The discussions were led by 11 ministers from the Salem area.

Dr. Alfred H. Stone of the University Evangelical Lutheran Church of Seattle was the keynote speaker.

Growth Brings Problems

Willamette University can look back on 1963 as the year of growing pains. For the first time in its 122-year history, enrollment exceeded 1,400 to reach an all-time high of 1,441. Over 400 new students stepped through registration lines to replace nearly 200 June graduates.

Fortunately the opening of the new $200,000 science wing alleviated overcrowded classroom conditions, but the increased enrollment was felt in other areas. Law school, Library and residence facilities have been stretched to the limit, spurring plans for new development. A College of Law complex has been given top priority as the next construction project and plans are in the preliminary stage for an addition to the library. In September, two new sorority buildings were put into use, continuing Willamette's plan of bringing all living organizations onto the campus where the University can maintain the same high standards for all students.

The expanding student enrollment makes additional faculty mandatory. The present plan is for a gradual increase over the next few years.

Willamette's Music School adopted a new major field in music therapy this year, offering instruction on methods of using music to help physically and mentally handicapped people relate to something of a non-verbal and non-threatening nature.

The Law School conducted a unique experimental project in September, setting up a residency in human relations and group dynamics to increase competence in working with people.

Willamette's second annual pre-orientation camp for new liberal arts students was again highly successful, giving freshmen a thinking man's start to college level studies.

In addition to the many grants given to graduates for further study, over 500 Willamette graduates are utilizing scholarships and grants totaling over $150,000 for the current school year.

National Science Foundation funds and other scientific grants were obtained during the year, continuing Willamette's contribution in biology, chemistry and physics research.

On the social side, Willamette acquired a new fraternity, Delta Tau Delta, and initiated a deferred rush system for the six fraternities, reserving pledging of freshmen to second semester. The five sororities will follow this program next year.

Next year will also bring a major decision on Willamette's development plans. Passage of the city urban renewal program would open up a 21-acre site south of the present campus for the proposed long-range construction of a music building, four sorority houses, a married students building, faculty housing, student union, field house and administration building, all designed for Willamette's growing needs.

Books for Tonga

Books to some students are what you carry to class and then dust off for examinations, but to one student at Willamette University they are luxury items that could greatly boost his native country.

Setaleki Kaveinga Havea, a 32-year-old native of the Tonga Islands, has been studying at Willamette the past three years with the expressed design of returning to his country in June to become Inspector of Schools.

As the only Tongan student in the United States, he has adapted amazingly to an entirely different world and has come to realize what value education really has and what it could do for his Islanders.

Fortunately, Havea has been spoiled by the educational facilities in the U.S. and finds now that books, from the primary level on up, could answer many of the Tongans' needs.

The Kingdom of Tonga is a British protectorate of 150 islands (not all inhabitable) and over 50,000 people. The Islands are in the South Pacific about 430 miles southeast of Fiji. The largest city is Nukualofa on the 99-square-mile island of Tongatapu with 20,000 people.

While school is compulsory for Tongan children, they are faced with very poor facilities and supplies, and teachers are the sole source of information because of no library and very few books.

Havea indicated that instruction often breaks down when teachers, who have learned only by word of mouth, don't have the answers, and worse yet, don't have any place to turn to find them.

Since English has been compulsory for the past three years, the printed word could be deciphered, so even the most elementary books could be used and the more technical volumes could serve advanced students and instructors.

Havea, who studied two years in New Zealand and taught eight years prior to coming to Willamette, is dedicated to education, so will have a large populace to serve and huge task facing him after his return.

Willamette students have already responded to Tonga's library needs with book donations, including a set of encyclopedias. The college texts will be handy for instructors, but attention has been turned to the public for contributions of used primary books, picture books, high school texts and any other appropriate story books as well as additional college texts.

The Willamette library will act as the "books for Tonga" depot and will store all donations until they can be packaged for shipment. Havea is currently checking methods of shipment and a drive is being organized to provide funds for freight costs.

Dean Geist

The College of Music

Melvin H. Geist will retire in June as Dean of the College of Music, completing 25 years in this office

Not only have Dean Geist's years as administrator been marked by notable achievements in building up the size, scope and prestige of the College of Music, but as teacher of voice and director of the University Choir he has had a part in launching several outstanding careers.

During Dean Geist's tenure Willamette has been accorded full accreditation by the National Association of Schools of Music and is now an institutional member of that organization. In 1957 Willamette acquired a chapter of Pi Kappa Lambda, a major honorary society in the music world. The granting of such a charter is indicative of superior attainment in music.

Dean Geist has received many honors from the musical profession. He is at present Vice President of the National Association of Teachers of Music in charge of regional programs throughout the United States. He also served 12 years as Regional Governor, covering Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana and Alaska. In this capacity he has four times brought to Willamette summer workshops for teachers of singing, attracting to his staff some of the nation's most famous teachers of voice.

Long musical tradition

Music has had an important place in Willamette Curricula for well over a hundred years, but not until 1870 were courses offered leading to music degrees. The first two degrees were granted in 1872. Since that time a steady stream of Willamette graduates has gone on to musical careers in education, the performing arts, composing and conducting. Many of them have reflected honors on Willamette by their achievements in graduate schools such as Eastman, Oberlin and Julliard.

Among Dean Geist's former students several might be mentioned who have achieved eminence. Michael Carolan, after study in New York, toured as soloist with the Robert Shaw Collegiate Chorale. He also received two Fulbright Scholarships for study in Italy.

Reid Shelton sang the role of Freddy Eynsford-Hill in the road company of "My Fair Lady". This company made an extensive tour of Europe, going as far as Moscow.

Tom Larson also studied in New York and sang a solo part in the Broadway production of "Camelot".

Carolyn Hedman strives to please Dr. Heiden.

The University Choir of 1951 grouped around the Great Seal in the State Capitol rotunda. This was one of the last of Dean Geist's choirs.

Music therapy

After several years of preparation the College of Music this year achieves one of Dean Geist's cherished ambitions—a degree in Music Therapy. Probably less than a dozen institutions in the United States offer this degree, and only three on the Pacific Coast. Willamette was urged to take this step after an on-the-spot survey by Dr. Don Michel of Florida State University, a national authority in this field. He cited Willamette's exceptional opportunity because of the concentration of mental and correctional institutions in and around Salem, providing a field for observation and practice therapy.

Music Therapy, an ancient art but a new science, is a fast growing field and competent therapists are in great demand and very short supply. The great value of this therapy is now recognized as a means of conditioning formerly unresponsive patients and opening the way for psychiatric correction. The recreational value of music is, of course, well known, and Willamette students willing to volunteer for this activity have long been welcome in the state institutions.

"Old Historic Temple"

One hundred years ago in February the first stone was laid for the foundation of venerable Waller Hall. It's been a lively century.

Waller Hall in the 1860s.

"Rev. A. F. Waller, the live College Agent, has been visible on our streets for some days past. He seems to have unwavering faith in the divineness of his call to secure the needful funds for the completion of the edifice of the Willamette University. We suggest to all that meet Bro. W., to give him something for the College at once, as it is the cheapest method of getting clear of him."

"Rev. A. F. Waller, our irrepressable College Agent, has been in our city during a portion of the week. He says the new college edifice must and shall be completed and paid for. His purpose is to fight it out on that line."

These excerpts from the press of the day are quoted by Dr. Robert M. Gatke in his Chronicles of Willamette. They are, in epitome, the history of Waller Hall's beginnings. In his indefatigable scouring of the Willamette valley over a period of years Alvin Waller gathered, bit by bit, the forty thousand dollars of the original investment. In these missions he supported himself by selling books so that every dollar of donation might eventuate in brick and stone.

To most of us Alvin Waller is just a name, but he comes magnificently alive in Dr. Gatke's book. Few of Willamette's benefactors have matched him in zeal and devotion. "The building of Waller Hall," says Dr. Gatke, "was almost, if not entirely, indispensable for the continued existence of the University . . . It would be hard to conceive of any college hall having more of one man's work built into it." In spite of all this, it was not officially named Waller Hall until 1912.

The story of the bricks

College catalogs have often mentioned the fact that Waller Hall's bricks were made from clay dug from its own basement. It's true! An old record tells us ". . . it was found that the earth to be removed to make room for the basement was as good a material as any that could be found; hence it was decided to make brick upon the ground. A professional brick-maker was employed to superintend the manufacture of 500,000 brick." A Salem visitor reported, "The bricks are the best I have ever seen in Oregon. They more resemble pressed brick than the ordinary ones."

Evidently the visitor knew what he was talking about. Waller's solid walls still stand firm, though its insides have twice been burned out and rebuilt.

The magnificent edifice

The building of Waller Hall was a huge undertaking for a pioneer community. Ten years passed before the final touches had been added, though it was in use long before that time.

Press accounts and personal reminiscences show that the building was regarded with considerable awe. Travelers approaching Salem, long before the village was visible, could see Waller's noble and solitary silhouette on the far horizon. Those who ventured to the cupola were rewarded by "views of the beautiful town, with the circling landscapes of varied and unrivaled beauty."

For nearly half a century Waller was the only brick building on the campus and encompassed nearly the entire college. A list of its functions seems incredible. It held the chapel (described as "the largest hall in this city"), several classrooms, an "apparatus room" (laboratory), a parlor and ladies' reception room, library, "two elegant halls for College societies," medical and surgical departments, dormitory rooms, dining room and dressing rooms "with multitudes of hooks and accommodations for hats and coats, or shawls, cloaks and bonnets." But this was not all! There remained the attic, "where abundant room remains unemployed for callisthenics and gymnastic purposes, and intended to be so employed."

Through the years, as new buildings arose on the campus, Waller Hall adapted itself to a multitude of uses through innumerable remodelings. The offices of the personnel deans, to the right of the east entrance, was once the college book store and similar space in the west wing was the Collegian's editorial sanctum. After the burning of the old gym the area that is now the 'Cat Cavern was a shower and locker room with a door in the south wall opening onto old Sweetland Field.

Fifty years ago chemistry students carried on their nauseous operations on the second floor, whence their fumes swirled down the stairway into the chapel, keeping students awake if not alert. Later the second floor became the library until Professor "Benny" Franklin's heavy tomes threatened to sag into the chapel.

College life? Waller Hall saw it all

It could hardly be expected that a building could exist for a century as the center of a college community and still leave an unblemished record of dignity and decorum. There was, of course, the inevitable cow-in-the-chapel—not once, but twice. These and other raucous events moved a Collegian writer of forty years ago to dub our stately edifice "The Old Hysterical Temple."

At about this time, for example, there occurred a famous riot. When the students assembled for chapel it was noticed that the benches of the freshman men were empty and a restive spirit pervaded the assembly. The devotions were soon interrupted by a shrill whistle from outside and the sophomore men arose as one and headed for the exits. Finding the aisles congested, most of them scampered along the backs of the wooden pews like mountain goats. The sounds of battle arose on the campus amidst a considerable audience of partisan co-eds.

This was a major crisis. Dean Alden sprang to the lectern and attempted to stave the chaos by announcing a hymn. The number he chose under such dire stress turned out to be the hit of the whole show—"Jesus Calls Us O'er the Tumult." Hostilities spread in all directions and ended in dozens of dunkings, both in the millrace and the State House fountain.

The Chronicle devotes but little space to student aberrations, but they do recall the plight of a University trustee (back in the eighties) who returned to the tree where he had tethered his horse to find a saddled cow instead.

Another chapel episode involved a hive of bees, which (according to the Statesman) "were turned loose to bask in the gospel sweets that have been enunciated within its walls during these many years."

Destruction by fire

The first fire, which occurred in the fall of 1891, was not nearly as destructive as the second. The upper part of the building was burned out and the remainder badly damaged by water, but school work was resumed almost immediately on the floors that were left.

The reconstruction, however, gave the building a radically changed appearance. A mansard roof, with many dormer windows, replaced the old one, and as a further monument to the ugly architecture of the nineties, a square shaft of a tower arose in the center. This tower was so structurally unsound that it was later removed.

The second fire (during Christmas vacation, 1919) destroyed the entire interior. The top floor, behind the dormer windows, was used as a men's dormitory, and several of the men were asleep in their rooms. They made their escape after being awakened by students throwing rocks through their windows. One of them, Fred McGrew (later head of the speech department at Fresno State College) made his way half way around the building on an eighteen-inch ledge to gain the fire escape.

In its second reconstruction Fred A. Legge, the architect and a Willamette alumnus of the eighteen-eighties, had the good sense to restore the building's original simple lines, so that the Waller Hall of today has the same appearance as the first structure. It was also an engineering triumph. Hidden within its interior walls are massive trusses supporting the upper floors and permitting the removal of the central pillars that once disfigured the chapel.

Waller's best remembered relic

One feature of Waller Hall appears to have lodged in the memories of all alumni. This is the stone doorstep at the east entrance, worn thin by the feet of generations now departed.

In the early twenties Frank B. Irvine, famous blind editor of the Oregon Journal, returned to the campus for a chapel address near the end of his distinguished career. He could not see the campus as in his student days, he said, but experienced a wave of nostalgia when he felt the eroded stone beneath his feet.

After Dr. Howard Runkel's recent address to the graduate group in Los Angeles an elderly gentleman approached him to ask an important question—"Are the grooves in the stone doorstep still there?" When assured that they were his wife remarked, "Now he'll die happy."

Three Willamette men direct ultra-modern school in Tokyo

Reprinted from The Oregonian

How would you like to be the principal of a school where the 1,000 students represent 35 nationalities and speak as many tongues?

Just such an assignment makes life interesting for Frederick P. Harris, a 1935 graduate of Willamette University, who for seven years has been headmaster of the American School in Tokyo, Japan.

The school was founded in 1902 and enrolls the children of embassy personnel, American businessmen abroad, and staff personnel at Protestant missions.

"Having that many children with widely varied backgrounds presents problems," the veteran educator said, "but of one thing you can be sure—there's never a dull moment."

He pointed out that some Oriental families object because their daughters adopt the American teen-ager practice of wearing lipstick.

"And then it's quite a problem to figure out a lunch menu which is appetizing to children from 35 countries—many with radically conflicting likes and dislikes about food. We have found a happy middle ground by stressing fish, rice and vegetables," he said.

A colorful Japanese garden is enclosed within the circular walls of the new elementary school. Room sizes are flexible, with sliding interior walls.

The new adventure began for Harris in 1955 when he went to Japan to teach as a Fulbright professor at Kyoto University—the Princeton of Japan. Before that he had been chairman of the philosophy department of Western Reserve University in Cleveland.

While there he learned that the American School was in a sad state of affairs. He took a leave of absence from Western Reserve, signed on as American School headmaster, and surveyed the mess of old buildings and outdated equipment at the school.

Robert C. Storey, '21, Director of Development; Frederick Harris, '35, Headmaster; Donald Brand, '51, Principal of High School. Mr. Storey is Managing Director of the American Chamber of Commerce in Japan. Mosaic is on wall of little theatre.

"At that point it dawned on me that the land on which the school was located in downtown Tokyo was worth much more than the school," Harris recalls.

He sold the four acres for $2 million, went ten miles away and bought 15 acres for $1 million, and the rebuilding was under way.

He obtained grants from the U.S. State Department, funds from major American business firms in the Orient, and money from many missionary headquarters.

About $3.5 million has been pumped into the building program in the past three years, and Harris is now headmaster of one of the most modern grade school-high school combinations in the world.

The 24-room elementary school looks like a massive doughnut, and is connected by covered walkway with the equally modern high school. The joint schools have resource centers, the latest in language laboratories, a swimming pool, gymnasium and numerous multipurpose rooms.

It is probably the only American school where English is taught as a foreign language. Although English is the major tongue, all students must also study the Japanese language.

Educators from throughout Asia visit the school to see how American education functions.

A high degree of academic performance is demanded at the school, and such subjects as drama, music and the arts get heavy stress. Tuition for each student is about $600.

In progress are programs where American social studies teachers will attend a seminar at the school next summer to study Japanese culture and language. A Carnegie Corp. grant will permit American high school students to attend summer studies in Japanese culture.

The American School will arrange for the students to live in homes of fishermen and rice farmers near Tokyo.

There is another unique feature of the American School. It is in the process of raising another $750,000 to complete its building program by the fall of this year, and construction must be paid cash on the barrel head. Interest is so high in Japan (10 and 12 per cent) that there's no such thing as bond borrowing and long term mortgages.

Other Oregonians on the American School faculty are Donald Brand, former Florence school teacher; J. Winston Carmichael, Portland; and Robert C. Storey, Portlander who has been director of the American Chamber of Commerce in Tokyo for the past 12 years.

ALUMNI CITATION AWARDS, 1964

The Alumni Citation Award was established in 1957 to give recognition, before the community and the nation, to distinguished graduates for outstanding achievements and services which reflect honor upon Willamette University.

JOHN LAUGHLIN

WILLIAM LAUGHLIN

McGILVRA

TOWNSEND

Dr. John S. Laughlin, '40

Dr. Laughlin is recognized as one of the nation's foremost medical physicists. As chairman of the department of biophysics and medical physics at the Sloan-Kettering Institute for Cancer Research in New York for the past twelve years, Dr. Laughlin has contributed significantly to the outstanding progress made in cancer control. Dr. Laughlin also is attending physicist and chairman of the physics department at Memorial Hospital in New York, and professor of biophysics at the Cornell University Medical College. He received his Master of Science degree from Haverford College in 1942 and his Doctorate from University of Illinois in 1947. He remained at University of Illinois as associate professor for several years. He is a member of several professional societies, including Sigma Xi, the American Physics Society and the American College of Radiology. He is a son of Dr. Sceva B. Laughlin, former Willamette professor, and is married to the former Barbara Kester, Willamette class of '43.

Dr. William S. Laughlin, '41

Dr. Laughlin, chairman of the department of anthropology at University of Wisconsin, is perhaps the world's leading authority on the genetics, physical characteristics and cultures of the Aleut-Eskimos. He has been a member of no less than thirteen expeditions to the Aleutian Islands, Alaska, Greenland and other Northern areas to study the natives there. He has written at least thirty-two published articles on his expedition findings. He also has authored at least fifteen other published articles on various anthropological subjects, including articles on "Aleut" and "Physical Anthropology" for the Encyclopaedia Britannica. Dr. Laughlin received his Master's Degree from Haverford College in 1942 and his Doctorate from Harvard in 1949. He taught anthropology at University of Oregon before going to University of Wisconsin in 1955. Among the many professional organizations of which he is a member are Sigma Xi and the Association of American Archaeology. His father is Dr. Sceva B. Laughlin, former Willamette professor, and his wife is the former Ruth Finney, Willamette class of '44.

Hugh McGilvra '28

Mr. McGilvra is one of the vanishing breed of weekly newspaper publishers whose ability, dedication and integrity have made their newspapers the undisputed hub of all community activity. Since 1928, Mr. McGilvra has been publisher of the Forest Grove News-Times, a newspaper that is highly regarded not only in its own community, but statewide and nationwide as well. The News-Times has received the Sigma Delta Chi trophy for the best weekly newspaper in Oregon, and twice has received national recognition. Mr. McGilvra is held in high regard by his colleagues and his town-folk; he is past president of the Oregon Newspaper Publishers Association and was named Forest Grove's first citizen in 1961. Last September, Mr. McGilvra was appointed to the state legislature as a representative from Washington county. Mr. McGilvra's wife, Louise Nunn, '28, is a member of the Willamette University Board of Trustees.

Sophia E. Townsend, '03

Unquestionably one of the greatest tributes that can be paid to any person is to name a chapel in his or her honor. Few living persons have received such a high accolade. Miss Townsend is one of them. The chapel at Cascade College in Portland bears the name "Townsend Chapel." It was dedicated in 1947, and a plaque in the chapel carries this simple eulogy of Miss Townsend: "Recognizing twenty-five years of continuous service." Now, sixteen years later, Miss Townsend is no longer physically able to participate in the life of Cascade College, which she loves so well and served so faithfully for many years. She received her Master's Degree from University of Washington in 1910, and taught in Oregon and Washington public schools for several years before joining the staff of North Pacific Evangelistic Institute, forerunner of Cascade College, in 1922. When the school later began a four-year liberal arts program and became Cascade College, Miss Townsend was named associate professor of religion. She held that position until her retirement in 1954.

Ruth Margaret Hall, '29

Miss Hall died last September, soon after the alumni citation committee selected her as one of this year's award winners. Hers is the first Willamette alumni citation award to be presented posthumously. Even if she were still alive, Miss Hall could not have come to Salem to receive her award in person, for she had been bed-ridden with arthritis for years. Despite her severe physical handicap, Miss Hall was a hard-working, influential, highly respected leader in a number of religious, philanthropic and educational endeavors. Her minister writes, "From her bed, with the help of her mother's hands and feet, Ruth Margaret directed one of the most successful schools of missions our church has ever had." She was an influential leader in the Great Decisions program, authored several stories and plays, and tutored pre-school children. Miss Hall is gone, but her inspiration will continue to be felt by those who knew her, and by hundreds of others who never met her, but who benefited from her fine, unselfish work.

Dr. Erna Gunther, Anthropologist from the University of Washington, examines a few baskets with Dr. John Rademaker of the Willamette faculty.

University Collection of Indian blankets exhibited

A notable showing of basket work by western Indians opened in the Fine Arts Exhibition hall in January. Because of the interest aroused, the scheduled one month show was extended through February.

This excellent collection has accrued to the University through the years through the donations of pioneer families and represents West Coast cultures ranging from the Aleuts and Eskimos in Alaska to the Pimas and Apaches of Southern Arizona. Heaviest contributors to the collection were the Byrd and Polleski families.

Prior to the opening of the show the baskets were appraised and classified by Dr. Erna Gunther, Professor of Anthropology at the University of Washington. Said Dr. Gunther, "The Indians of North and South America are regarded by many as the best basket makers in the world, and in North America the best basket makers live west of the Mississippi River. Consequently this exhibition includes examples of America's finest basketry."

Carl M. Marcy, '34, wins editorial praise in Washington, D.C.

An item in the fall Alumnus reported the high honor accorded to Dr. Marcy as a recipient of the Rockefeller Public Service Award. The following editorial is from the Washington Post of December 7, 1963.

FIVE WHO SERVED

The presentation of the Rockefeller Public Service Awards has come to be an important annual event for all who are concerned with the quality of public life. There is no higher private honor for distinguished public service, and the $5,000 cash award is a tangible expression of thanks made possible by John D. Rockefeller 3rd. Every year since the program, administered by Princeton, began in 1952, the high caliber of the winners has augmented the prestige of the award.

This year was no exception. The five winners were: Eugene W. Weber, Deputy Director of civil works, Corps of Engineers; Henry Loomis, director, Voice of America, U. S. Information Service; Gabriel Otto Wessnauer, manager of power, Tennessee Valley Authority; Allen V. Austin, director, National Bureau of Standards; and Carl M. Marcy, chief of staff, Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

There is a moral, however, in the award to Mr. Marcy, one of the outstanding permanent committee staff members in Congress. Mr. Marcy holds a Ph.D. in international law and relations from Columbia University, where he taught prior to entering the State Department in 1942. Since 1950, he has been a key staff member of a key committee, and his knowledge of law and foreign affairs has left its imprint on much that Congress has done.

Unfortunately, Mr. Marcy's proficiency is not typical of staff standards in Congress. For many reasons — including pay scales lower than comparable scales in the civil service — the quality of staff personnel on Capitol Hill is raggedly uneven. Yet one lesson of the Bobby Baker scandal is the importance of developing a staff that is both competent and immune to corrupt temptation. Congress might well re-examine its staffing procedures; if men like Mr. Marcy were the rule in important jobs, there might be no embarrassing Baker investigation today.
