What society needs, not what it wants is President's welcoming theme

135th year opens with record enrollment

For a record 1,753 students, the 135th academic year at Willamette opened with a new freshness Sept. 1. Maintenance crews were still completing over $100,000 worth of projects when the academic bustle began in all four colleges.

President Robert Lisensky drew some knowing smiles from veteran faculty members who heard for the fourth year that "this is a most critical and exciting year." Without apology, he said he finds himself returning to that thought "because it captures the paradox of independent higher education. Privately supported colleges and universities are struggling with a pair of extremes—survival and significance. If that isn't critical and exciting, I don't know what is," he explained.

While lauding "more academic activities than ever this summer" and the direction he sees Willamette moving, Lisensky characterizes the pursuit with a quote from around the time of Willamette's founding. It's what American reformer Orestes Brownson told Dartmouth students in 1843:

Ask not what your age wants but what it needs;

*Not what it will reward,
But what, without which, it cannot be saved;*

*And that go and do;
Do it thoroughly;*

*Find your reward in the consciousness of having done your duty, and above all,
In the reflection that you have been accounted to suffer somewhat for mankind.*

This thought of what society needs, not what it wants was Lisensky's general theme in the several welcoming addresses setting the tone for the year.

"I would like to see us relate knowledge and learning with believing and acting. I really believe that we have forgotten that the emotional and spiritual development as well as the intellectual enrichment is necessary if we are to deal with the whole human being," he said in an opening week convocation.

Earlier he had told law students that "the real issues of today involve questions of values not just technology. There is a critical need for value-centered inquiry. It is that kind of wisdom that I wish for you."

Willamette as an institution is grappling with some of the value questions. Of major importance is the Alternative Futures Project (see page 3) which is addressing anticipated life style changes in a no growth (steady state) society. Several undergraduate faculty members are continuing the Experiment in Freshmen Education, focusing on energy constraints. The new Graduate School of Administration is taking a significant step enriching management practitioners with an expanded part-time program, enrolling 42 people for one or two courses.

The increase in part-time students helped swell Willamette's total enrollment to the record high 1,753. Last fall's 1,724 was the previous high. By college, Liberal Arts, 1,156 (613 men, 543 women); Music and Theatre, 92 (28 men, 64 women); Law, 384 (298 men, 86 women); and GSA, 121 (100 men, 21 women).

The joint degree program between administration and law is proving popular. Nineteen are currently enrolled in the four-year program that leads to both the J.D. and M.Ad. degrees.

Academic quality of incoming students remains high. Average GPA of entering undergraduates is 3.2, while first year law students had college GPAs of 3.36 and average LSAT scores of nearly 600 compared to the national average of 524.

Among some of the needed maintenance and minor building projects completed in September were underground repair of 700' of steam line from the boiler to Doney Hall; office remodeling in Eaton to accommodate the financial aid office; interior remodeling and reorganizing the library; bringing the chemical stock room up to code and repairing a broken water line in Collins Hall; re-roofing the Fine Arts Building and resurfacing four tennis courts.

NEWSCENE

A Scene change

You will be hearing from us a bit more often, but we won't have as much to say. That sums up the minor change in the Willamette Scene, starting with this issue.

Our frequency is increasing from four to six times a year, but the size of the issues will decrease from the 16 to 24 page issues of the past to 8 to 12 pages.

We're hoping you will find the issues easier to read and more timely. We expect to save money and time in the production of the Scene and by switching some of the individual mailers to the Bulletin Board section (see notice on the continuing education trip to Maui, for example).

We're also exploring the possibility of incorporating special inserts for Law Alumni and admissions prospects. We welcome your suggestions.

Practicum popular in music therapy

Various institutions around Salem are feeling and hearing the impact of Willamette's expanded Music Therapy practicum.

Donna Douglas, a registered music therapist from Arizona State, is new to the College of Music and Theatre staff. It only took a month for her to place 34 students in 13 different facilities to gain field experience "in the scientific application of music to change behavior."

Music has proven to have a therapeutic affect on many people with mental or physical health problems. It is particularly beneficial to patients who have a low self-esteem.

Students in music therapy combine course work in psychology and sociology with music courses. After graduation they must successfully complete a six-month clinical internship to become registered music therapists.

Convocation hour making a comeback

Alumni who recall the days of weekly chapel and convocation . . . and then the chapel/convo boycott of the early 1960s . . . will be interested to learn that convocations are making a comeback.

Chaplain Phil Hanni is heading a subcommittee of the Speaker's Committee charged with programming the Wednesday at 11 a.m. hour. In announcing the return of non-compulsory convos Hanni encouraged students not to be spooked by the name and Willamette's convo history. In fact, he's looking for a new name to characterize the weekly gathering.

Programs to date have been entertaining and stimulating. Following an opening address by President Lisensky, the early schedule included a playgroup performing 200 RPM and a mountain music workshop; the Royal Lichtenstein quarter-ring circus; a forum on the Alternative Futures Project; and political activists Jack and Micki Scott speaking on issues of Grand Jury investigations to a full Waller Auditorium.

Upcoming programs include pianist Jim Cook, historian George McCowen, Shakespearean excerpts by members of the Oregon Shakespearean Festival; and a preview of the Beggar's Opera by the WU Opera Theatre.

Law grads dip below 90% on bar exam

For only the second time in the past seven years Willamette's law alumni dipped below the 90 per cent level on the Oregon State Bar examination.

Fifty-three of 63 first time takers passed for an 84.1 success rate. Willamette's average since 1970 still remained above 90 per cent at 91.3 (419 of 459). This is still substantially above University of Oregon (86.4) and Lewis and Clark-Northwestern (76.2). All takers of the Bar exam have averaged 83.0 since 1970. Willamette law alums still hold the record of 98.1 per cent set in 1970 (51 of 52).

Sports success FORE Willamette

FORE Willamette, a benefit golf tournament that netted nearly $3,700 for Sparks Center equipment, got Willamette's sports season off to a swinging start. Some 72 alumni and friends participated in the inaugural four-man team best-ball competition at Illahe Hills in Salem Aug. 16. The $100 entry fee included two meals, tee prizes and much fellowship.

Former Oregon Governor Tom McCall was the celebrity speaker, sharing the spotlight with the winning team of Bob Elfstrom, Wes Gladow, George Kreitzberg, and Roy Ferris '37.

Fun things were happening back on campus, too. The Portland Trailblazers returned to Sparks Center for their 6-day pre-season practice camp, giving campus folk a sneak preview of what is touted to be the best Blazer team in their seven years.

Other notable returnees were the football and cross country alumni. The ex-gridders provided coach Tommy Lee's current Bearcats a good struggle for three-quarters before succumbing, 27-2. The alumni harriers also came out on the short end, 26-40, but Bob Ladum '67 surprised the young 'Cats with a come-from-behind win in the 5-mile battle. About 30 gridders and 10 harriers felt the competitive urge to return.

Meanwhile, the current crop of Bearcat athletes are showing strength. Lee's gridders dropped their first two pre-season games to NCAA opponents Nevada-Reno and Puget Sound. However, the stiff competition helped prepare the 'Cats for their 40-30 triumph over nationally ranked and pre-league favorite Whitworth in the Northwest Conference opener.

Chuck Bowles' cross country runners have emerged as league favorites after a pair of high finishes in collegiate invitational. The women's field hockey and volleyball teams are expected to be title contenders as Bearcat women start defense of their WCIC All-Sports championship.

Carl Gerlinger flashes a satisfied smile during the FORE Willamette benefit golf tournament. He won three golf balls for this shot inside the ring on number five at Illahe Hills Country Club. Willamette was the big winner, netting $3,700 for Sparks Center equipment.

Alternative Futures Project developing curriculum options for 'steady state'

Start with an assumption, add some funds, and capture the imagination of some modern day prophets. That's the simplified recipe for a project that could significantly alter Willamette's curriculum in the near future.

The assumption that our future may be quite different than the present convinced the Lilly Endowment, Inc. to invest $165,000 in the Willamette "brain trust" that carries the name Alternative Futures Project (AFP). These funds sparked several summer projects aimed primarily at curriculum development to address a "steady state future." Steady state is the term suggesting limits to growth in areas where growth has been taken for granted, for example in the economy and the development of energy resources.

In other words, a steady state future may be one in which various types of constraints drastically effect current lifestyles. Some such constraints might be energy shortages, physical resource depletion, and more humans than food resources can support. The prospect of international power shifts, and drastic changes in political and economic systems around the world add to the uncertainty.

Prof. C. Russell Beaton '60 of the economics department is serving as Director of the AFP. He sees the project addressing the question "how can higher education assist students to be ready for a civilization which will require new kinds of sensitivity and adaptability?"

He suggests that "traditional approaches which emphasize mastery of technique within a thickly insulated discipline may have to be scrapped. Methods which attack a problem in all its multi-faceted uniqueness are likely to be preferable to those which reduce the problem to the view from a single, narrow perspective."

Beaton and associate director Elliott Abramson, professor of law, both see the AFP "sensitizing" the campus to curricular reform. That doesn't mean a wholesale discarding of the present curriculum, but rather some amalgamation which will allow fresh insights into "the way we've always done it."

Among the 14 summer projects following a two-week workshop was one specifically addressing curriculum development. The intent is to concentrate on interdisciplinary structures and techniques with problem and future-oriented content.

The primary purpose of the summer projects was to plan and develop proposals for possible implementation during the academic year. Among some of the proposals:

- An interdisciplinary course centering on "The Willamette River" as a tangible and practical illustration of the "limits to growth" concept.
- Establishment of a Center for Public Affairs to encompass liberal arts, law and administration to take greater advantage of Willamette's proximity to state government.
- Suggested ways in which law, the legal system, and legal education might be modified or radically restructured to correct inequities and meet future challenges.
- A study of how science is to be interpreted and used with consideration given to moral and ethical dilemmas associated with scientific advancement.
- Feasibility of developing a non-profit corporation as a vehicle for alternative lifestyle and value-related demonstration projects around the philosophy of scarcity and resource constraints.
- Development of courses in the area of mass communication and society.

These and several of the other summer proposals are being studied for possible implementation. Speakers and specialists in futures-related matters are being invited to address the campus and its energetic effort to explore alternative futures.

OPINION

During this summer's Democratic and Republican national conventions, Watergate was listed among the many problems which the country has faced and solved. Democrats maintained that Watergate proved the strength and resilience of the American political system. Republicans argued that it proved the ability of their party to confront a problem squarely and to deal with it effectively. Both parties gave the impression that Watergate is behind us; now we must move ahead with politics as usual.

Several analysts of the Watergate episode and students of the American political system seem to agree. Some, like Duke professor James David Barber, contend that Watergate was nothing more than the manifestation of unfit personality. In his book Presidential Character published in 1972, Barber predicted that because of his "active negative" personality, Richard Nixon would prove incapable of responding to a crisis in office. Barber correctly anticipated that Nixon would freeze, abandon all flexibility and pursue one course of action, even if it pointed to disaster.

Historian Theodore White, in his book Breach of the Faith, echoes many of the opinions of Barber. White notes Nixon's inability to be honest with people, even his own family, and argues that his downfall through Watergate was brought about by the "contradiction between his smothering public pieties and his ruthless private conduct." Another historian, Henry Fairlie, contends that Watergate stemmed from Nixon's inclination to treat politics like a public relations job and his inability to be ennobled by holding Presidential office.

These analyses of Watergate basically are complementary to the views expounded by both parties during their national conventions. Watergate is seen as an aberration on the American political stage. It disappeared with the resignation of Richard Nixon. Nixon, in turn, is regarded as a pathetic, if not tragic, figure who survived in the American political system for some 35 years but who was purged ultimately by the system he betrayed.

It would be easy and comfortable to believe that the Watergate episode was that simple and that it is over. The self-congratulatory celebrations of the Bicentennial contribute to the temptation to put behind us that unpleasant facet of our history. So does the flurry of the current Presidential campaign. I would like to suggest, however, that Watergate went much deeper than Richard Nixon, that it cannot be understood and dismissed as an isolated event.

Watergate may reflect a problem which is cultural at root and has lessons to teach which did not end with the resignation of Richard Nixon. Considerable thoughtful literature has appeared in the last two years encouraging us to take a deeper look at Watergate and the lessons it may be able to teach about our cultural condition.

The late Yale professor Alexander Bickel contended in an essay entitled "Watergate and the Legal Order" that Watergate cannot be separated from the socially destructive civil disobedience which has occurred regularly in the United States for the last 15 or 20 years.

Bickel argued that the behavior of white Southerners in the mid-1950s in reaction to Supreme Court desegregation decisions, the tactics of some during the civil rights movement of the 1960s, and the antics of Vietnam anti-war protesters had something in common with the behavior of White House personnel during Watergate: a lack of understanding of the limits of civil disobedience in a contractarian government.

Contractarian government requires that citizens accept certain limits on their behavior. One limit is willingness to obey the law, which Nixon, like other groups of this generation, refused to do. The fact that increasing numbers of people and groups willingly transgress the contract through acts of civil disobedience threatens to explode the limits which are presupposed by this form of government.

Bickel saw the Nixon years reflecting another dimension of cultural malaise. Nixon took office amidst cries of repression and fascism, cries which no matter how plausible in retrospect, were bound to have an effect on administration morale. "Men who are loudly charged with repression before they have done anything to substantiate the charge," warned Bickel, "are apt to proceed to substantiate it." Bickel's real concern was that civil disobedience whenever one disagrees with any law can become habit-forming, bringing with it the overhanging threat of anarchy. Nixon's resignation did little to assuage that threat.

Indiana professor Patricia Curry agrees that Watergate cannot be dismissed so simply. She argues in "Public Virtue and the Presidency" that we cannot expect virtue to exist in our rulers if that same virtue is lacking in ourselves as citizens. James Madison, speaking for the Founding Fathers, stated that premise clearly to the Virginia Constitutional Convention:

"I go on this great republican principle, that the people will have the virtue and intelligence to select men of virtue and wisdom. Is there no virtue among us? If there be not, we are in a wretched situation. No theoretical checks—nor form of government—can render us secure..."

If Watergate exposed a lack of virtue, moderation or temperance upon the part of the President, Curry contends that the same defects undoubtedly are present in the larger American culture. Her main concern is that Watergate reflects a growing loss of "community" in the United States which would provide a moral framework for determining proper public and private behavior. This loss of community also makes it difficult for us to determine the characteristics which a President ought to possess.

That Watergate may reflect another cultural defect was hinted by public relations expert Joe McGinnis in his book The Selling of the President in 1968. It appears that the American people are willing to buy almost anything if it is properly packaged and advertised. This seems to be true of political candidates as well as of toothpaste.

Theodore White contends that Nixon grasped this fact back in the 1950s, reducing his campaigns to sophisticated public relations planning, deliberate management of images, phrases and symbols, and careful orchestration of emotions. That's what the voters wanted.

Auburn professor Gerald Johnson contends that early in his career Nixon came to believe that the "masses of Americans are children and must be treated as such." He succeeded for as long as he did because he was reinforced in that belief.

The foregoing perspectives suggest that Richard Nixon and the Watergate episode merely reflected the cultural milieu from which they emerged, a milieu of collapsed morals, disregard for civic virtue and the need for moderation in a contractarian form of government, and refusal to reason about political things in the face of appeals from the mass media.

From this perspective, Watergate hardly is a thing of the past. The real challenge is not to return to politics as usual as both political parties suggested at their national conventions. The challenge is to recognize Watergate as an episode exposing deficiencies in the American character and to rededicate ourselves to an understanding of the requirements of our form of government and the need for civic virtue among both rulers and ruled.

As columnist David Shaefer argues, "... the perpetuation of a popular form of government depends not only on the ability of its leaders, but also on the maintenance of a spirit of morality, dedication to the common good, and a willingness to bear the duties of citizenship—even in a time of hardship much greater than any we now face—on the part of the American people themselves..."

Accomplishing this goal will not be easy. Alexis de Tocqueville noted in 1848 that the "discharge of political duties appears to (Americans) to be a troublesome annoyance that diverts them from their occupations and businesses."

Veteran campaign watcher Fred Dutton echoes Tocqueville, claiming that the American public has a short attention span, having been conditioned by television, and that we shy away from sophisticated discussions of issues and programmatic details.

The current Presidential campaign provides us an opportunity to demonstrate that both Tocqueville and Dutton underestimate the character and capacity of the American public. Certainly we can choose to believe spokesmen for both parties that Watergate is an event of the past.

But we also can take advantage of this Presidential campaign and Bicentennial year to reflect on the requirements of popular government and the close relationship between private and public morality, the need for moderation, and the requirement of an enlightened, thoughtful citizenry if popular government is to survive.

Dr. Leeson is a 1968 graduate of Willamette who joined the faculty in 1970. The above is a condensed version of her presentation at the National Endowment for the Humanities summer seminar on "Politics & Morality" at Duke University.

ANNUAL REPORT

1975-76: WHAT WE ARE ABOUT IS SIGNIFICANT

In his State of the University address to the Willamette faculty near the end of the 1975-76 school year, President Robert P. Lisen-sky said, "... the only way we are going to be able to face the future is to decide that what we are about is significant and, if it is not, to make it so and then establish a style for its fulfillment."

What was especially significant about Willamette in 1975-76 was the direction in which it was moving. Toward education for responsible citizenship and personal growth as well as advancement of learning. Toward faculty and administrative development and self-improvement. Toward the engagement of all students, faculty and staff in establishing a greater sense of being a community of learners.

Willamette is engaged in enlightened discussion of value questions; within the curriculum, it is demonstrating a concern for the problems affecting humanity.

Some highlights of the year which the president noted were: A Quality of Life interdisciplinary program for first-year students now called Experiment in Freshman Education; a $165,000 grant from Lilly Endowment to study value questions—the largest program grant in Willamette history; a successful Nutrition Awareness program that revealed the significance of a co-curricular education; new responsibilities accepted and accomplished by the Faculty Council and the Academic Council; the establishment of an Affirmative Action program; a final draft of the Administration Evaluation program; improvement of faculty development through the effective use of Atkinson Foundation funds; the College of Law's People's Law School; renewed interest in the library; a more effective career education office; and a first graduating class of 31 in the Graduate School of Administration.

The president also pointed to difficult but important debates on the role of the College of Music and Theatre and to the successful fund-raising/public relations year. In the latter area, he listed the new giving clubs (the Waller Society and Jason Lee Society), an Annual Fund Committee, a Deferred Gifts Committee and a Community Advisory Council.

The major disappointment was the minimal success in fostering interaction among the University's four colleges. But the Lilly project will help in such interaction and other programs are developing.

The president concluded his remarks to the faculty with a plea for openness to change, an understanding of interdependency and a respect for diversity.

The current positive direction of the school and an affirmative response to the president's plea will assure the continuing significance of Willamette University.

Gift Highlights

- For the second consecutive year, Willamette received more than $2.6 million in gifts—the first time the University has exceeded $2 million two years in a row.
- With a total of $2,675,971, the University enjoyed the second best gift year in history.
- Income from federal and state governments, largely for student financial aid, reached a high of $1,180,535.
- Although the number of donors and the amount for operating funds increased, total voluntary giving was down $308,296.
- Alumni participation in support of the academic programs through the annual funds increased approximately one percent; 21.3 percent of alumni contributed.
- The campaign for the Geo. H. Atkinson Graduate School of Administration reached $3.66 million in cash and pledges.
- Foundation support was very high—$961,366—but below the $1,266,789 of the previous year.

The bicentennial year at Willamette was significant for a variety of reasons. At the dedication of the Seeley G. Mudd Building which houses the Geo. H. Atkinson Graduate School of Administration, Mr. Atkinson was honored with a plaque from Ann Liakos, student body president of the GSA. Appropriately, the year also included the theatre performance of the hit musical 1776.

Willamette students were in group-study clusters more often than usual in 1975-76 because of innovative academic programs such as the Experiment in Freshman Education and the Alternative Futures Project. Students still found time to excel elsewhere, and field hockey was one of the many championships Bearcat women won in claiming the WCIC all-sports trophy for the third straight year. Willamette men were second in the Northwest Conference all-sports standings.

Maui at Aloha Cost

For Willamette Alumni, Parents, and Friends, a 14-day study tour led by biology professor Donald Breakey '50, and earth science professor Harry Rorman is offered June 13-27, 1977.

Limited to 35 people (age 8 and above) on a first-in, first-served basis, the experience includes study of the Hawaiian environment plus Hawaiian history and culture by instruction and on-site demonstrations. Facilities include six A-frame cabins with cots and concrete floors, a large mess hall and kitchen, showers and toilets at Camp Pecusa, a church camp on the beach approximately seven miles south of Lahaina on Maui.

Cost: $180 plus air fair, per person, for all meals, lodging, island transportation, and instruction.

An additional "pre-session" on the island of Hawaii will be offered for 21 participants (age 12 and above) from June 9-13, 1977. Facilities are a state-owned camp, also with cabins, showers, and toilets.

Cost: $75 plus air fare, per person, for all meals, lodging, island transportation, and instruction.

For additional information and an application form, please write to Jim Sitzman, Chairman, Continuing Education Committee, Alumni Office, Willamette University, Salem, OR 97301.

SUE SAYS . . .

As we start a new program year, I wish to share with you the recently adopted goals of the Alumni Association Board of Directors. Among priorities are the activities of alumni groups around the nation, the development of continuing education opportunities, the coordination of selected alumni activities among the four colleges, and the continued effort to secure more donors and more dollars for the Alumni Fund.

Although elected directors assume the responsibility of chairing a number of standing committees dealing with these and other issues, we are constantly looking for interested alumni to serve on the following committees:

Committee, Chairperson
Nominations/Records and Achievements, Bud Alkire '71
Admissions, Nevitt Smith '45
Alumni Clubs, Terry Hall '69
Loyalty Fund, Bob Miller '53
Special Events, Edna Mae Bryan '43
Continuing Education, Jim Sitzman '59
Publications, Julie Reid '55

Other areas of important alumni involvement are support of existing Alumni Clubs and in the development of new clubs where there is a sufficient number of alumni to generate a "happening." Another is service as a "newscat," gathering class news for the Willamette Scene. Contact the Alumni Office soon to volunteer in the area of YOUR special interest.

Sue (Mellor) Juba
President
Alumni Association
