From the TOWER

Whipple honored with doctorate

Jerry Whipple, assistant to the president and director of alumni affairs, received the honorary degree Doctor of Commercial Science from the University of Puget Sound August 14. Dr. Whipple has been at Willamette since 1955, and as a result of his work WU received the first American Alumni Council award of $1000 in 1959 for greatest improvement in alumni support among large coeducational colleges. Both his Bachelor's and Master's degrees in Business Administration were earned at the University of Oregon and he has done graduate work in College Administration at the University of Michigan.

Jim Booth wins Booth Award

Thirty-four years ago the late J. Henry Booth of Roseburg left provisions for a trophy to be given to a Willamette University senior who, "in addition to maintaining high scholarship standing, has exerted a fine moral influence and has achieved the best standing in athletics."

This spring that award was presented to his grand nephew Jim Booth, a healthy limb on the family tree that the elder Booth would have considered a real "grand" nephew.

Not only has Jim won 11 athletic letters in four sports at Willamette, but he has maintained high grades in a tough economics-math major to gain admission to the Harvard School of Business for next year.

"As fine a young man as I've ever seen around," said football coach Ted Ogdahl. From John Lewis, athletic director and 17 years basketball and baseball coach: "Certainly one of the finest boys we've ever had on any squad and one of the very few four-sport men to perform here."

Jim came to Willamette from Yoncalla, Oregon, with a winning smile and a list of high school honors only a man his size could carry. He continued the trend at Willamette, gaining friends and respect and new honors all the while. He ended his collegiate career with the Booth Award and a senior key for outstanding service to the University.

New alumni officers

At the beginning of the two-year term in June William R. Thomas, Lebanon attorney, assumed the presidency of the Willamette University Alumni Association, automatically moving into that spot after serving two years as president-elect. Eugene L. Lowe, Salem insurance executive, was chosen by his fellow alumni to become president-elect, from which post he will step up to the presidency in 1966.

Other officers elected were Pauline Findley Wulf, Salem, secretary; David Barrows, Portland attorney, director. Elected for three-year terms as alumni representatives on the University Board of Trustees were Randall Kester, on the legal staff of the Union Pacific, Portland; and Dr. Loren Winterscheid from the faculty of the University of Washington medical school, Seattle.

Otto J. Wilson, Salem, is the outgoing president.

New calendar to start in fall of '65

Willamette will adopt a new school calendar starting with the fall term, 1965. The start of classes will move up nearly three weeks to September 6 and will allow the first semester (and term exams) to end before Christmas vacation.

The plan calls for a three-week break before the start of the second semester January 15, 1966, with the one-week spring vacation in March instead of April. Classes will end May 23, 1966.

According to Dean of Admissions Richard Yocom the new plan received full approval from the faculty and administration with the belief that it will be a definite improvement over the current scheduling.

Gift from U. S. Steel

An unrestricted $15,000 capital grant has been awarded to Willamette University under the United States Steel Foundation aid-to-higher-education program. The grant will be added to the funds being raised to double the size of the library, increasing stack space and adding classrooms, according to President Smith.

U. S. Steel is starting its second decade of financial aid to colleges, universities and institutions. This year 760 such institutions have received $2,550,000 from the foundation in operating grants and $400,000 more in capital grants.

New student center

The construction of a temporary student union in Matthews Hall basement is underway to be ready for use by September. Long awaited by students, the union provides a soda fountain and lounge, seminar and conference areas, and a main floor area with tables and chairs. After several attempts, a plan was presented that met approval by the student senate, the board of trustees and the student body. Construction of the temporary union will fill the need for a student center until plans are possible for a permanent structure. Many furnishings in the new setup will later be transferred to the permanent union.

Alumni who remember the friendly service provided by Mrs. Eleanor Swenson in the old 'Cat Cavern can rest assured that it will be continued, as Mrs. Swenson will manage the fountain. While the fountain facilities will be open from 7:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m., the union will remain open until closing hours every night, including Sunday, with a variety of vending machines to dispense edibles. An external stairway will permit entrance to the union so that student traffic will not disturb dormitory residents.

Eye lenses may succeed where teeth fail

Twenty-two individuals remain as the vestiges of a once-great population—of meadow mice, that is. Dr. Don Breakey of the biology department is in the process of accumulating data from his two-year project to find a method of determining the ages of these rodents, also known as voles.

While the age of many animals can be determined by tooth-wear, the molars of voles (genus Microtus) are ever-growing. So since summer of 1962 Breakey has been developing a colony of voles that has resulted in records on approximately 3000 animals. The maximum living at one time was 1000 at the end of last summer.

Originally Breakey set out to conduct an analysis of meadow mouse populations, which occasionally burgeon into a plague. However, this project required knowing the ages of sample animals. Since there was no adequate method to determine this age, the current project was developed.

This summer he is beginning the even longer process of killing, weighing and preserving the animals, from which he will collect eye lenses and skeletal parts. At the beginning of August more than 1500 animals had been weighed, with about 1400 waiting in the freezer.

The unusual idea of attempting age determination by the development of the eye lenses came to Breakey from a former classmate who is now head of clinical pathology at the University of Alabama Medical School. Previous research has shown that in red foxes, cottontail rabbits, antelope, and fox squirrels there is an increase in the mass of the eye lens as the animal grows older.

Young scientists and writers attend JESSI and CASSI classes

Each summer for the past four years an inquisitive, scientifically minded group of young ladies has descended upon Willamette for two weeks of concentrated study at the Junior Engineers and Scientists Summer Institute (JESSI). This year approximately 90 such high school juniors and seniors attended classes in biology, chemistry, mathematics and physics.

Intended to acquaint the participants with various areas of learning in science and engineering, the program helps the students decide whether or not they are suited to a career in these fields. The teaching is conducted by regular faculty members and the course of study is determined by the host university. There is no choice of classes by the students, thus exposing each to all phases of the program. Willamette's JESSI for girls is one of three in the U. S. and is a counterpart to the boys' JESSI held at Oregon State University for the past nine summers.

Following this year's session, JESSI faculty members were asked to compare the group of students with those of previous years. The consensus was that while there were fewer girls—thereby making a quieter group—they reacted in much the same way as previous participants. Conversation at the closing banquet indicated strong enthusiasm for the program on the part of the girls.

Upon the exodus of JESSI, another high school group of 72 members, this time coeducational, came to a Communications Arts and Science Summer Institute (CASSI). Whereas their predecessors had studied natural science, these students made an exploration into the world of communication, on the basis of language, philosophy, psychology and sociology, as well as media, purposes and techniques of communication. Willamette's CASSI was one of several pilot programs being run this summer by Scientists of Tomorrow, the organization which also sponsors JESSI in 12 colleges in the United States. Reports on this first experience at various colleges and universities will determine the future of the CASSI program.

Boys and girls attending CASSI seemed impressed with the program and faculty members involved in it were generally enthusiastic. This "student body" of 72 came mainly from Oregon, Washington and California, with representatives also from Idaho, Montana, Texas and Alaska. Professors, when questioned as to the type of student CASSI attracted, offered descriptions of "stimulated and stimulating," "very responsive," and "alert."

Plan for student center in Matthews Hall

New law building projected

Lack of space forces the College of Law to limit incoming class to 75 students. Over 1000 inquiries and 200 applications were on file on May 6th, when the class was declared filled.

Dean Reese

A fine looking young man, just out of the service, stood at the desk while the registrar explained the situation. His credentials were of the highest, but there just wasn't any room. He suggested that possibly he would stay out and work if there were a chance to get in next year. As he walked out Mrs. Criswell shook her head. "This sort of thing breaks my heart," she said. It has become an old story.

The law school has known numerous crises since it opened its doors in 1883 (first law school in the Northwest), but turning away highly qualified students was not among the agonizing problems faced in a sparsely settled pioneer land. That first year the school had four instructors and three students—a teacher-student ratio that was over-balanced in the wrong direction.

One of the great problems of that day was persuading aspiring lawyers to go to school at all. The accepted method was to "read law" as an apprentice in a lawyer's office—a practice that was officially decried by the American Bar Association as long ago as 1879.

The hard facts

Today's student crisis is growing more acute each year, and it will not diminish. Oregon's college enrollment now numbers 44,000 and will reach 99,000 by 1974, according to studies made by the Oregon Department of Higher Education.

When the present law building was first occupied in 1939 there were 49 students. The same building now serves 188. Every facility is more than overcrowded. Without more space Willamette must face the fact that the steady, soundly-based post-war growth must stop after reaching a level second only to that of the University of Washington among accredited law schools in the Pacific Northwest.

For many years there has been a far greater demand for Willamette law graduates than the school can supply. Requests come from both large and small law firms; from towns seeking resident attorneys; and from government agencies.

As one of Oregon's two accredited law schools, how will Willamette react? Will it, through inaction, evade its responsibility to the profession and to the community and allow a serious deficiency to develop in a vital field of education?

The College of Law "earned the right to live"

Back in 1927 the school faced a serious dilemma. Up to that time it had existed as an evening school, with a part-time dean, which precluded recognition as a standardized school. Either it must fall behind as a second rate school or seek full accreditation. The trustees decided that the school's record entitled it to full support and the "right to live."

The College of Liberal Arts had a vital interest in this decision because accrediting agencies had ruled that a university could not be regarded as standard if it maintained a college that was not standard. Eventually the difficult requirements were met and Willamette gained the recognition it sought. It is one of 130 law schools on the approved list of the American Bar Association, and one of 109 that are members of the Association of American Law Schools.

Backed by an imposing record

Willamette has become more than a provincial law school. The present student body comes from 106 colleges in 30 states and five foreign countries. This year Willamette law graduates are taking the bar examinations in Oregon, California, Washington, Idaho, Nevada, South Dakota, Colorado, New Mexico, Indiana, New Jersey, and District of Columbia.

Of this year's entering class, 20% come from the University of Oregon; 12% from Oregon State University; 9% from Willamette; 7% from the University of Washington; 13% from eight colleges and universities in California. The remaining 39% cover an area from Alaska to Mexico City; from Korea to Denmark.

In the bar examinations Willamette graduates consistently rank above the general level. This is doubly significant when coupled with the fact that 80% of entering law students receive degrees—an exceptional record.

A forward-looking program

Willamette has been progressive and alert in taking advantage of its fortunate location, adjacent to the Supreme Court and several lower courts and to the legislative halls and departments of the state government. Within this environment Willamette has developed numerous programs that provide exceptional opportunities to law students.

Willamette was one of six U.S. law schools originally selected by the Ford Foundation to conduct a pilot program for student participation in seminars, clinics and internship experience in the state and local governments. The three-year grant has now been extended to six.

How the Ford Foundation grant is being used

Is the legal profession meeting the needs of society for legal services? What changes, if any, are needed in the structure of the profession to meet these needs?

These are questions which third-year students are examining in the law school's program of professional responsibility. One of six colleges to receive original three-year grants from the National Council on Legal Clinics, Willamette has been awarded $10,000 for a three-year continuation of the project. The funds, made available by the Ford Foundation, will allow half of each third-year class to take the course.

As well as questioning the adequacy of the present legal system, the experimental project also hopes to promote improved relations between lawyers and members of other disciplines, notably the behavioral sciences, and to use the skills and knowledge of these sciences in dealing with people in need of legal aid.

"At times lawyers have taken these sciences, such as psychiatry and sociology, to be extraneous factors in the administration of the law," commented Professor Courtney Arthur, who directs the Ford program at Willamette. He feels this is unfortunate. "We spend billions for public welfare and yet give science no place in human relations." While lawyers are competent in the interpretation of the law, they sometimes "tend to become legalistic and divorced from the human element in what they are doing."

In attempting to create in prospective lawyers a greater awareness of the law as it relates to individuals, the over-all national program represented by Willamette's project shares an idea with some of the larger law schools, according to Arthur. In these schools such training is considered necessary for a well-rounded legal education.

Students in Willamette's program have worked with judges, district attorneys, policemen, psychiatrists, physicians, penologists and other experts. Also, Willamette's proximity to state legal, mental and correctional institutions has allowed hours of internship and actual contact with the human problems with which the project is dealing, and which a lawyer may face in practice.

Unique among all law schools is the "Legislative Workshop," taught by the Oregon Legislative Council, in which students draft bills for legislative committees. The Legal Research Service and the Legal Aid Clinics provide services that are available in only two other law schools in the entire West.

The word is "go"

The Willamette Board of Trustees has decided that "now is the time." It has created the Willamette College of Law Building and Expansion Fund and has set the goal at $1,000,000. Of this sum, $750,000 will be devoted to the new building and $250,000 will be added to the University endowment to support the enlarged program.

The new building will accommodate a student body of 300 and an entering class of 125. The figures have been determined after careful study. Experience of other law schools shows that 300 is an optimum size, both economically and educationally. It is large enough to support a fully rounded curriculum, and important enough to attract top speakers and faculty and develop a vital legal center in Oregon's capital city.

The fruits of this experience are evidenced in generally favorable reports from students, now practicing attorneys, who took the course. The majority of reports indicate this practical experience as students has given them better insight into human behavior and better understanding of human problems, specifically in cases such as divorce or where psychiatric help is needed.

Other areas of concentration in the program are participation in community affairs and the duty to provide adequate legal service where poverty, discrimination or other circumstances have existed and fundamental rights have not been protected.

Having completed its third year, the program has not been entirely without problems, however. The first year it was offered the course was elective, which, according to Arthur, was disadvantageous in that many students who would have profited greatly from the course did not enroll. For the second and third years participants were selected on an academically stratified, random basis to assure a variety of scholastic ability. This random, compulsory method built up some resistance in that some students wishing to take the course were automatically excluded and others who would rather have spent the time in traditional coursework were involved in the legal responsibility program. Therefore, the plan for the coming year is to return to the elective basis and to cut the work from four semester hours for the year to two. In addition, much of the material included in the original course will be integrated into other classes.

The future looks bright for continuation of the project, which has "become an integral part of legal education at Willamette," as described in the recent report to the National Council on Legal Clinics, and "will be continued for the foreseeable future." With the gradual assimilation of the legal responsibility material into the regular curriculum, Willamette's directors hope also to spread the internship system. This system allows students to work with practicing members of the legal profession, both public and private.

Willamette Alumna in the Peace Corps

Donna Horn '62, is one of 17 Willamette graduates to join the Peace Corps. She recently completed a two-year assignment in the Philippines, where her job as co-teacher in a village school was part of an enormous Philippine undertaking—establishing English as the national language of the Republic of the Philippines.

Donna's home, by Philippine standards, was by no means sub-standard. It was built for $400.

Teaching English to Philippine children not as

For two years, Donna Horn (B.A. '62) lived in a tiny, thatch-roofed cottage with no indoor plumbing, in a small village on a hot, humid Southern Philippines island, where water must be boiled and where goats and pigs roam the dirt streets.

But Miss Horn, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. H. G. Horn of Portland, minimizes her discomfort. "I was not concerned about the filth and squalor," she explains. "I didn't even know when it was raining. It was no sacrifice. It was just a job that had to be done."

The job: Teaching English and science to Philippine children, and helping native teachers improve their teaching methods.

Miss Horn was in the Philippines as a Peace Corps volunteer. The Bureau of Public Schools in the Philippines had asked the United States to send Peace Corps volunteers to the Philippines to work with native teachers in small towns.

Miss Horn was one of 168 Peace Corps volunteers scattered about in small towns throughout the island of Mindanao, second largest island in the Philippines. She was the only Peace Corps volunteer stationed at Villanueva (Spanish for "new town"), a seacoast fishing village of 4,000 inhabitants.

Miss Horn's affiliation with the Peace Corps started on a Spring day in 1962 when, as a Willamette senior majoring in political science, she walked into the office of Walter S. Blake, Jr., dean of students, and asked for an application form to join the Peace Corps.

"I was notified during finals week that I had been accepted," she recalls.

Soon after commencement, Miss Horn began her Peace Corps training at San Jose, Calif. She spent 10 weeks there, then trained for two weeks at Zamboanga Normal College on Mindanao island.

Much of the training was devoted to Philippine culture. "We were to live like their people so we could understand them better," Miss Horn explains. "We were not to be looked on as guests."

When she had completed her training, Miss Horn bundled up her hot-weather clothing, her radio and her typewriter and headed for Villanueva, where the townspeople had prepared for her a neat little cottage in a flowered courtyard amid coconut trees on the school ground. The cottage was built for about $400.

Miss Horn shared the cottage with an 11 year-old native girl, who explained local customs to Miss Horn. The girl also taught Miss Horn how to cook traditional Philippine dishes.

Classes at Villanueva Central School started at 7:30 a.m. and lasted until 5 p. m. And the days not only were long—they were hot. The school consisted of three buildings, surrounded by vegetable gardens maintained by the students.

The school housed six grades. Miss Horn worked with the native teachers of all six grades.

"We were to be co-teachers," explains Miss Horn. "We were not to come in and take over the teaching job from the native teachers, but were to assist them, to be always at hand, ready to help them in any way we could."

At the request of the native teachers, the Peace Corps volunteers did a lot of actual teaching—particularly English.

English has been adopted as the official national language of the Republic of the Philippines. The Filipinos do not have a true national language of their own. The Philippine language is diluted into eight principal dialects with a total of 81 dialectical subdivisions.

Because of this domestic language barrier, compounded by the unique geography of the Philippines (an archipelago of more than 7,000 islands), the Filipinos realized the need for a national language to facilitate the conduct of government and commerce.

The choice of English was a natural one for two major reasons: 1) The Philippines had been a possession of the United States for about a half-century before the Republic of the Philippines was established as an independent nation in 1946, and 2) many Philippine natives had picked up some English from American servicemen during World War II and the American Occupation following the war.

Today, many Philippine adults use English in their written communications, but in conversation virtually everybody in the Philippines reverts to one of the 81 sub-dialects.

When children enter school, they have not yet been exposed to English. In the first and second grades, the local dialect is used as the language of instruction, and English is taught as a second language.

The aural-oral system is used to introduce English to the youngsters. The teacher speaks an English word, and the pupils repeat it. The Peace Corps volunteers call this the "mim-mem" system. That's short for "mimicry-memorization."

Repeating English words that are simple for American children is no simple task for Philippine youngsters. Some English consonants have no equivalents in Philippine dialects. For instance, the children of Villanueva had never attempted to pronounce the sounds "V" and "B" until they began to learn English. The children, through mimicry of Miss Horn's patient voice, gradually learned to utter the unfamiliar sounds.

Beginning in the third grade, English is the language of instruction, and only English is spoken in the classroom.

Towns such as Villanueva do not have high schools. Grade schools go through the sixth grade, and if parents want their children to attend school beyond the sixth grade, they must send their children to a larger city. The nearest public high school to Villanueva is 17 miles away. Public transportation facilities are generally good in the Philippines,

easy as A-B-C

so it is possible for most children to continue their education beyond the sixth grade.

The Peace Corps volunteers stressed the importance of a high school education, and encouraged sixth graders to continue their schooling.

Because of the unselfish dedication and enthusiasm of Miss Horn and thousands of others like her, the people of the Philippines and other countries throughout most of the world are overcoming the illiteracy that has plagued them for centuries.

The people of these nations are beginning to find their place under the sun—but there is still a lot to be accomplished.

Miss Horn admits she felt discouraged at times. "I got discouraged," she says, "because I could not see a lasting effect of our work."

Her concern for the long-range benefits has inspired Miss Horn to pursue a career in international human relations. She plans to take additional work in the humanities at an Eastern college, and hopes eventually to work for the United Nations.

Coe American Studies' fellows look at past, present and future

Why did Goldwater win the Republican nomination? What will be the future role of Republican moderates? What will be the major national problem facing the generation now in the secondary schools? Can the public schools meet this challenge? What should the U.S. do about southeast Asia?

These questions and others were directed to ex-Governor of Oregon Charles A. Sprague at one of the special luncheons held during the Coe Institute of American Studies for high school teachers at Willamette, June 15-July 24. Fellowships were given to 29 social studies teachers from Oregon, Washington and Idaho by the William Robertson Coe Foundation to receive a refresher course in the American Heritage at the hands of Willamette faculty and distinguished representatives of education, politics and business.

Two purposes underlie the Institute of American Studies. First, it is intended to provide additional professional preparation; second, it attempts to give these leaders of youth new insights into the nature and meaning of the American heritage in today's world.

The 28 men and one woman participating in the Institute each received six hours of graduate credit in history or political science for successful completion of the course, titled American Heritage and Institutions. They were a selected group, each of whom received expense-paid fellowships from the foundation.

Along with the actual coursework in American history, economics, political theory and government, the group toured a number of pertinent areas and institutions around Salem. Prominent also among the outside-class activities were the special luncheons. Among speakers for these were ex-Gov. Sprague, noted publisher, writer and former United Nations official; Travis Cross, press secretary to Gov. Mark Hatfield and active in the 1964 G.O.P. convention; Dr. James Lyles, head of Willamette's education department; Dr. Marion Morange, W.U. professor of French and recently honored by the French government for work in international cultural relations; Mr. Dean Pollock, retired advertising executive; and Mrs. Ruth Sheldon Knowles, lecturer, author and oil industry consultant.

On each Wednesday evening the group participated in "director's sessions," in which program director Howard W. Runkel of the speech department spoke on topics such as "Who Is the Truly Educated Person?", "The Challenge of Change," and "Great American Speakers and Speeches." On other occasions the group submitted questions for consideration. In another special activity, the Coe fellows watched several of the important speeches of the Republican convention.

All parts of the program were directed toward the mutual exploration and exchange of ideas that can be achieved in a seminar-type situation and evaluation sheets submitted by the fellows indicated the six-weeks had achieved its objectives "overwhelmingly," according to Runkel.

One professor described them as "the kind of kids you'd like to see in your freshman class in a couple of years," and another as "a stimulated group of young people who are looking for answers."

Some of this stimulation found expression in the creative writing class. According to the instructor, Elaine Roddy, the students showed a wide range of critical and creative ability—"some were very mature in their efforts and others were only beginning to learn how to be critical." The significant reaction, however, was that a number of students set up conferences to discuss their own writing. Some even sent home for writing, as well as bringing in work they had done during CASSI.

A very favorable reaction was generated by the Pentacle Theatre production of "Antony and Cleopatra," given in honor of Shakespeare's 400th anniversary. Arrangements were made for a special performance for the CASSI students on their first night at Willamette. Dean Richard Yocom, associate director of the program, expressed a hope to include a Pentacle production again next summer if CASSI is repeated at W.U.

Another comment indicated that some students felt they were covering too much material to assimilate in the two-week time. Also, in classes such as creative writing, which had much discussion, investigation was often cut short by the time allotment. Another suggestion for the next session was that there be a class in jurisprudence.

Summing it up, the CASSI experiment was successful at Willamette, and with the improvements that can come from a "trial run," there are hopes it will receive a return billing.

New director at Willamette

Mr. Robert E. Cowen, currently Director of Development at John Burroughs School in St. Louis, Missouri, has been named Director of Development at Willamette University starting September 1. In this post, new for Willamette, Cowen will be responsible for developing the program of financial support of parents, students, alumni and friends of the University, with an endowment goal of $5 million for capital purposes of the University.

Cowen received his Bachelor of Arts degree from Princeton University on a four-year full-tuition scholarship, with a major in English and American Studies. Since then he has taught and coached at St. John's School in Houston, Texas, and John Burroughs School.

Dr. Harry S. Irvine, '15

This summer death came to one of Willamette's distinguished alumni, Dr. Harry S. Irvine of the class of 1915.

Dr. Irvine was born in Calais, Maine, October 9, 1893, and had been a resident of Oregon since 1911. He was graduated from the University of Oregon Medical School in 1919. Following four years as campus physician at Oregon State University he began his practice in Portland in 1925.

Dr. Irvine served in the Army Medical Reserve in World War I and as surgeon for the Public Health Service in World War II. During the second war he was one of three Oregon physicians serving as Medical Procurement Officer for the military services. He was active in the American Academy of General Practice, and in 1954 he was honored as "Doctor of the Year" for Oregon.

Dr. Irvine is survived by his widow and five children, Dr. Harry Irvine, Jr., Dr. Willis J. Irvine, Edith Catharine Meyer, Mary Ann Irvine and Nancy Jane Irvine, all of Portland. His brother Paul (Ph.D. from Columbia and a noted educator at Alabama Poly) who died a year ago, was also graduated from Willamette in 1915. A younger brother, Athill, will be remembered by many alumni as one of Willamette's all-time great quarterbacks in the "Matty" Mathews era.

Enrollment up

By mid-summer 530 new students had paid tuition deposits for the fall term—an increase of 13 per cent over the same period last year. The rolls were closed for first year law students on the sixth of May and for new women students on the first of June. The quota for men was filled a little more slowly but had reached completion by the first of August. These figures indicate that total enrollment will be near the 1500 mark—largest enrollment in Willamette's history.

Dr. Kaestner assists state in problem-driver study

A two-year grant to develop an interview program for helping problem drivers is currently occupying Dr. Noel Kaestner, associate professor of psychology. Kaestner will be principal investigator for the project, for which Oregon's Department of Motor Vehicles was awarded $22,000 from the Accident Prevention Division of the Public Health Service.

Kaestner reported the grant was preceded by research comparing adolescents with drivers in fatal accidents. He noted that past records of drivers in fatal accidents were similar to those of teenagers and therefore driver immaturity may be a key trait in accident involvement.

Under the grant Kaestner will attempt to systematize the interview program. At present a driver with a certain record of serious violations and avoidable accidents first receives a warning letter, then is called in for an interview. Kaestner hopes to make this interview more effective and therefore to improve the driving habits of these people.

The grant is the first of its kind to be received by the Oregon department and is only the second Public Health Service grant ever awarded a state motor vehicle department, the first going to New York a year ago. Kaestner will work with the manager of the agency's Driver License Division.

Law students win awards

Six Willamette University College of Law students received awards for their spring semester work. Winners of the West Publishing Company Annual Hornbook student awards are Ted Runstein, Crested Butte, Colorado, first-year student; Charles Kirk, Portland, second-year; and Edward Lewis, Salem, third-year, who also received the Frank A. Turner award for the school year. Receiving the Corpus Juris Secundum student award for first-year students was Thomas Denney, Grants Pass; second-year, Daniel Ritter, Salem; and third-year, Hugh Cole, Jr., Bend.

Memorial tree planted

The planting of a young sequoia in memory of Richard Kerr, Willamette student killed by a rolling log at the beach in February, was one of the special events for the 59th annual May Weekend, May 1-2. The memorial dedication was made on behalf of Beta Theta Pi fraternity, which Kerr had pledged the night before the tragedy. His parents, Mr. and Mrs. Lyle Kerr of Whittier, Calif., were present to hear tributes from university president G. Herbert Smith, chaplain Cal McConnell and Beta president Chuck Flynn.

Willamette tradition is strong in these families

Three graduation "generations" are represented in Mr. and Mrs. Neil Shaffer ('39) of Kent, Washington, and their daughters, Mary Gayle ('64) and Margaret, who is entering Willamette this fall. Mary Gayle received honors at entrance and graduated cum laude. She was president of Mortar Board, senior scholar in psychology, student body office manager, held Atkinson and National Methodist scholarships, and is a member of Alpha Chi Omega, Alpha Lambda Delta and Psi Chi psychology honorary. Like her sister, Margaret has been awarded honors at entrance. Graduating from high school with a 4.0, she was a member of National Honor Society, attended Girls State, served as cheerleader and on the homecoming court and was very active in the Methodist Youth Fellowship. Melvin H. Geist, retiring dean of the College of Music (left), receives the diploma of the late Mrs. Helen Goodenough, which was issued by the College of Music in 1908. Making the presentation are Mrs. J. H. Drysdale and Bryan Goodenough, children of Helen Goodenough. "It was a source of considerable pride to my mother," writes Mrs. Drysdale, "that there are three generations of Willamette graduates in our family." Two sons, Edwin ('29), and Bryan ('26) have Willamette degrees, as does Bryan's daughter, Mrs. Maxine Hayes ('41). Three grandchildren also attended Willamette but did not graduate.

Robinson-Chrisman descendants cover a century at Willamette

Mrs. Ina Stilwell Taggart, class of 1899, Ontario, Oregon, was an interesting (and deeply interested) visitor to the campus on Alumni Day in June. She represented a family that probably has the most remarkable Willamette background in all of Willamette's long history.

The Robinson and Chrisman families settled in Yamhill County in 1844. These pioneer families were united through the marriage of a Robinson son and a Chrisman daughter, who started the Willamette tradition by sending three children to Willamette in the eighteen-sixties. One of these, in turn, became the mother of four Willamette students, the grandmother of two more, and great-grandmother of the latest graduate who received his degree in 1963, just 97 years after the graduation of his great-great aunt in 1866. His great-great-grandmother graduated in 1871. Here is the record:

First generation:

Mary Robinson Gilkey '66. First white girl born in Yamhill County. Taught at Willamette in 1879.
John M. Robinson —,
Eliza Robinson Stilwell '71.

Second generation (all children of Eliza):

John B. Stilwell, Jr. —.
Lena Stilwell '95.
Mamie Stilwell Randall —.
Ina Stilwell Taggart '99.

Third generation:

Max Stilwell Taggart, law '37, now a practicing attorney in Ontario, Oregon.
Gordon Randall —.

Fourth generation:

Max Stilwell Taggart II, '63, now working for a graduate degree in psychology at Texas Christian University.

Still in the family is the original Robinson Donation Land Claim near Dayton in Yamhill County, a "Century Farm".

When asked for a photograph Mrs. Ina Taggart was unduly modest. "I haven't any picture that I care to send," she wrote.

1964 COMMENCEMENT

Two foreign students invited to Washington

Two foreign students at Willamette, Setaleki K. Havea of the Tonga Islands and Francoise A. Goeury, Herserange, France, were selected as two of 20 foreign students in the nation to attend the Contemporary America Seminar in Washington, D.C., June 8-11. The all-expense paid trip, under the auspices of the Foreign Student Service Council, provided the two the chance to view the inner workings of the national elections.

The seminar included the following topics: federalism in American politics; the role of labor, management and the unions during elections; problems of the party out of power; what it's like to be a candidate; news media and the election; how to reach minorities; and the role of women in an election campaign.

Havea and Miss Goeury both graduated from Willamette this June, the former with a Bachelor of Arts in history, the latter with a degree in political science. They both returned home this summer.

Willamette to be represented at Vassar inauguration

Dr. John H. Glasse of the Department of Religion at Vassar College and graduate of Willamette will be our representative at the inauguration of Dr. Alan Simpson as President on October 16th.

Dr. Glasse is spending the summer in Germany on a grant from the American Philosophical Society doing research on a book which he is writing during the coming year. This opportunity to write is available to him through a Faculty Fellowship from Vassar, where he will be in residence while completing his book.

National Science Foundation grant for student research

The National Science Foundation has granted $7,000 to the Willamette University chemistry department to enable several students to conduct individual research. The grant will allow four undergraduates to work during the school year and three to engage in research next summer. The program is under the direction of Dr. Paul Duel, head of the department. A similar project was carried out last summer, directed by Dr. Norman Hudak, professor of chemistry. Research areas are inorganic, organic and physical chemistry.

Three degree recipients with officers of the administration. From left, Dr. G. Herbert Smith, President of the University; Fred J. Patton, Doctor of Humanities; Charles Kent Mills, Doctor of Laws, who delivered the commencement address, "Implications of the Knowledge Explosion"; William Gerard Banks, Jr., Doctor of Business Administration; George H. Atkinson, President of the Board of Trustees. Drs. Patton and Mills are Willamette alumni.

Threatening weather forced commencement ceremonies indoors from the accustomed site in McCulloch Stadium. The transplanted exercises were held in the Salem Armory.

To have builded onself into the structure of the undying institutions, to have aided in the development of the priceless instruments of civilization, is to have lived, not in vain, but to have lived in perpetuity.

—Elihu Root

It is, of course, largely by the extent of the support accorded to a college by its own graduates that the world judges of the right of that college to seek cooperation of others in planning for the future. An institution that cannot rally to its financial assistance the men who have taken its degrees and whose diploma is their passport into the world is in a poor position to ask assistance from others. It is not merely what alumni give; it is the fact that they do give that is of supreme importance.

President Eliot of Harvard (1869-1909)

Gridders to celebrate Ogdahl's 13th year

Former Bearcats who earned their cleats under Coach Ogdahl have sounded the tocsin for a gathering of the clan to inaugurate Ted's "lucky 13th" year at Willamette. All Ogdahl warriors are urged to return for Homecoming on November 14, when Willamette meets the University of Puget Sound. Following the afternoon game there will be a dinner in the Gold Room of the Marion Hotel at 6 p. m. Reservation cards will be mailed in September. If you don't get one, and if you're an Ogdahl man, write to the Athletic Department and demand your rights.
